Abstract: Compared to most of their European counterparts, Germany and the Netherlands often take deviating positions with regards to economic policies. This phenomenon has been explained by the influence of ordoliberalism. The role of scientific bureaus of political parties as mediators of exchange between ordoliberal theory and practice had not yet been documented. This research fills large parts of this knowledge gap by analysing this role. By means of an extensive archive research, the formative years of ordoliberal policies (1945-1970) have been covered. In Germany, the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung (CDU) and the Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung (FDP) were studied. In Netherlands, these were the Teldersstichting (VVD), Doctor Abraham Kuyperstichting (ARP) and the Centrum voor Staatkundige Vorming (KVP). The detailed descriptions of these diverse institutions and their publications allows for many interesting observations and conclusions. The most important conclusion is that the ideas that the German scientific bureaus expressed, were clearly ordoliberal. In addition, in the Netherlands only significant ordoliberal traces have been found at the Teldersstichting.

I Introduction

Ever since the financial and economic crisis hit Europe, a marked difference in economic policy insights among EU member states became apparent. No matter whether the topic at hand was ‘Eurobonds’, ‘quantitative easing’, ‘Greece’ or simply ‘austerity’, Germany and the Netherlands were always on the one side of the table. On the other side? Practically the rest of Europe. The continued ‘rebel position’ of the two countries has led to increasing frustrations and misunderstandings in the rest of the EU. It has also worked the other way round: the differing opinions in the rest of the EU have also frustrated the Germans and the Dutch.<sup>1</sup>

This phenomenon has quickly found its way into academic research, where scientists tried to identify how ideas came to diverge to such a great extent across national borders. A good example is this year’s bestseller The Euro and the Battle of Ideas, that tried to explain the differences between ‘German’ and ‘French’ economic traditions by tracing their respective long-term historical, intellectual and cultural origins. In comparable fashion, a considerable chunk of the literature focused on the continued influence of ‘ordoliberalism’ in Germany. Although some authors disagree, most find that the influence of ordoliberal thought is clear and has been pervading German economic thinking throughout society, ever since it came to prominence shortly after the Second World War. Even Sahra Wagenknecht, the current leader of the communist wing of the most leftwing party in the German parliament, Die Linke, advocated a return to and improvement of a society built on ordoliberal ideas. With this plead she also explicitly states that ordoliberal policies indeed have been implemented in the postwar period, a fact that is well-documented and not disputed. An aspect that has been neglected though, is the role that scientific bureaus of political parties have had in the increasing authority of ordoliberalism.<sup>2</sup>

Ordinary think tanks are a relatively new phenomenon in Europe. The first few decades after the Second World War the research institutes that had by far the most influence in Germany and the Netherlands, were the party-affiliated research institutes, or scientific bureaus of political parties<sup>3</sup>. Usually these institutes form the basis of the eventual programme of the affiliated political party. And where do the institutes get their information from? The idea is that scientific bureaus derive it from academic research. Or simply put: scientific bureaus of political parties transpose scientific theory into concrete policy measures and these policy measures will be adopted for the greater part by the corresponding political parties.<sup>4</sup>

This research tries to fill a knowledge gap by describing and analysing the role of scientific bureaus of political parties in transposing ordoliberal theory to policies. To narrow down the research, the focus is on two countries: Germany and the Netherlands. Germany is an easy pick, as, among other reasons: it is the birthground of ordoliberalism; nearly all research into ordoliberalism focuses solely on Germany; Germany is the most powerful country in the EU with even a quasi-veto for matters that require only a qualitative majority; and most important: many claim ordoliberalism pervades German economic thought to this day. Why the Netherlands? It practically always sides with the (ordoliberal) economic policies pursued by Germany; research about ordoliberalism in the Netherlands is virtually non-existent, meaning there is another knowledge gap that can be filled. There are also a few other countries that often side with Germany and the Netherlands when it comes to economic policy in the EU, most notably Austria, Finland and Luxembourg. There are several reasons why not to include these into the analysis, including the following: Luxembourg has a marginal influence when it comes to EU decisions; Finnish documents are impenetrable for non-Finnish speakers; one has to narrow one's Master Thesis down and because the author is Dutch, it is easier for him to relate to the Netherlands than to Austria.

To further narrow down the research, the focus will be on the period after the Second World War to approximately 1970. This is the period of the heyday of ordoliberal policy in Germany, led by Ludwig Erhard and his aides.<sup>5</sup> Although nearly always in a coalition, the CDU and its little sister-party the CSU have been in government for this whole period. Also, under Merkel's leadership these two parties have been the main political current in all coalition governments of the last more than 10 years, covering the full duration of the financial and economic crisis. The choice for researching the scientific bureau of the CDU is then evident. The CSU is left out of the equation, as it is not nearly as influential as the CDU. On the other hand, the scientific bureau of another party is scrutinised though, namely the FDP. The hypothesis is that it is more likely to find ordoliberal links in this party that is outspokenly liberal. Moreover, the FDP had been in power during most of the postwar years as well.

For the Netherlands, it is a little more complicated. The current Dutch equivalent of the CDU/CSU is the CDA. On its own merit that would already be a good reason to choose to research the economic policies advanced by the scientific bureau of the CDA. Moreover, the CDA has been in the coalition government in the first five years of the financial and economic crisis. However, the CDA did not yet exist in the postwar period. Therefore, the scientific bureaus of its two most important predecessors, the KVP & ARP<sup>6</sup>, are scrutinised instead. Just like the CDU, both these parties had often been in government during the postwar period in the Netherlands, thereby further providing grounds for choosing them as the objects of this research. The latter also holds true for the Dutch VVD, which in addition is an outspokenly liberal party and thereby the equivalent of the German FDP.

<sup>6</sup> The third founder of the CDA is the CHU. The CHU itself is a spin-off of the ARP and has had similar policy stances as the ARP. Together the ARP and the CHU had approximately the same political weight as the KVP on its own in the formation of the CDA. When one has to limit the scope of his research, leaving out either the ARP or CHU is easy to defend. The CHU is left out, because they had been marginally smaller than the ARP.

To sum it up, the scrutinised scientific bureaus are those of the German CDU and FDP, and the Dutch KVP, ARP and VVD. Did their scientific bureaus indeed play the role as has been described above? Did they indeed transpose ordoliberal economic thought into ordoliberal economic policy? And if indeed they did, what causes or reasons behind this can be found? Also, what about the Netherlands? Can evidence be found for ordoliberal economic theory being transposed into economic policy there? Are there any parallels between the developments of the scientific bureaus of the political parties in the two countries? Or can specific knowledge flows of ordoliberal ideas be identified? The methodology for doing this research was fairly straightforward, but still innovative. It can be retraced in the structure of this thesis. First, a firm academic framework was constructed about ordoliberalism. What is ordoliberalism, what were its economic ideas, and where did it come from? This is answered by relying heavily on prior research, in which the German ordoliberalism is also placed in the appropriate international context (Chapter II). Second, all the facts and circumstances are described that are necessary to provide a sound image of the five different scientific bureaus. Facts and circumstances that could be important for linking a scientific bureau with either ideas or policy receive extra attention. That also means that a close look is taken at the relation between the political party and its scientific bureau, for example by scrutinising the funding, appointments and the history of creating the scientific bureau. Of course, a description of the activities of the scientific bureaus is provided as well. A large emphasis is placed on their written publications, for they often give the most precise view of the ideas that were propagated. In order to present a description of all the mentioned information and more, a thorough research into the archives of the scientific bureaus had been conducted. To bring some order, the results for the individual German (Chapter III) and Dutch (Chapter IV) scientific bureaus are presented in two different chapters. In these chapters, complicated crosslinks, interpretations and in-depth analyses are not too frequent. Due to the complex nature of comparing five different scientific bureaus, in two different countries, and linking economics, politics and history, a proper explanation in these chapters would often require too much space. Therefore, the choice has been made to save these considerations for the end of the thesis (Chapter V).

II Ordoliberalism

What are the historical, ideological and political backgrounds of the development of ordoliberalism? In answering this question, first an excursion is started into a broader international movement that is at the root of the development of ordoliberalism (§II.1). It tells the story of how marginalised liberals finally found a first way of putting new life into their ideology: neoliberalism was born. The story continues with how Friedrich von Hayek set up the influential Mont Pèlerin Society and how this society slowly lost its neoliberal feathers. Subsequently, a description of the German branch of this international movement is presented (§II.2). The narrative starts with a brief history of Germany and its economy in the preceding decades, which in many ways were of great influence in the forming of ordoliberal thought. In addition, it identifies the main advocates of ordoliberalism, their personal ideological backgrounds, and the economic ideas they propagated. The last paragraph then describes how these economic ideas were implemented into policies by Ludwig Erhard and his companions (§II.3).

§II.1 Neoliberalism and the Mont Pèlerin Society

Ordoliberalism is rooted in a broader international movement that started to take shape in the second half of the 1930's. This was a turbulent time, with the Great Depression still wrecking countries throughout the world. In some countries, this helped provide the opportunity for fascist leaders to find their way to power, such as Mussolini in Italy, Hitler in Germany and later Franco in Spain. In other countries, extensive government-sponsored programmes were set up to try to keep the economy afloat, such as in the UK or in the US with Roosevelt's 'New Deal'. In addition, Stalin was turning the Soviet Union into an experimental communist society. Among these leaders there was a broad consensus it was the state's responsibility to manage and steer the economy. Indeed, the public debate about economic issues did not concern the question if the state should intervene, but how it should do so. This was in a sharp contrast with the previous era of laissez-faire, during which governments simply allowed the market to run its course. It is against this historical background that intellectuals that broadly self-identified as liberals felt marginalised, as their ideas were laughed upon and not taken seriously.<sup>7</sup>

In an attempt to overcome their marginalisation, these liberals sought ways of keeping their liberal legacy alive. This was easier said than done, mainly because of two interrelated obstacles. First, they were widely dispersed geographically, which severely hampered the possibilities to effectively exchange ideas. Communication with peers is essential for a body of thought to survive, let alone for it to prosper. Second, as liberal ideas were anything but fashionable, it was hard to disseminate them. Not only were fewer and fewer people open to these views, this also directly reduced the possibilities of finding outlets that wanted to publish the liberal message. In a society with none of the current network possibilities, all these obstacles formed real hurdles for keeping the liberal thought alive.<sup>8</sup>

Especially the obstacle of a wide dispersion prompted some liberals to attempt to set up an international forum for likeminded people. The first successful attempt was the Colloque Walter Lippmann, held in Paris in August 1938. The Colloque was so named after the transatlantic visit of Walter Lippmann, an American journalist who had recently published a well-received book that fiercely criticised the totalitarian tendencies of the American society: An Inquiry into the Principles of the Good Society.<sup>9</sup> Organised by the French philosopher Louis Rougier, the Colloque included several recurring characters in the history of neoliberalism and ordoliberalism, such as Friedrich von Hayek, Ludwig von Mises, Wilhelm Röpke and Alexander Rüstow.<sup>10</sup> As such the Colloque could very well be understood as the starting point of the history of neoliberalism. Then the assembled academics decided that ‘neoliberalism’ was the collective thought that they would represent, albeit without reaching consensus on its name or its contents. What they did agree upon was that they should embark upon the creation of a community that would discuss how to reconstruct liberal doctrine. Interesting to note here is that at the end of the Colloque Alexander Rüstow said he could already observe two reconstruction camps:

a majority camp that sought liberalism's failings within liberalism itself, and a minority camp that deemed nothing wrong with the old liberalism. Leaning more towards the former camp, the participants<sup>11</sup> decided to found the Centre International d'Études pour la Rénovation du Libéralisme, an institution with the goal to study what the exact role of a government should be if it were not to be 'an indifferent spectator, but a neutral arbitrator that would 'protect the rules of the game'<sup>12</sup>. Although the Colloque Walter Lippmann and the Centre Internaional provided a fruitful start of enlivening liberalism, the outbreak of World War II subsequently upset all efforts.<sup>13</sup>

World War II put a complete halt to the neoliberal project. Instead of moving forward, all emphasis was on preserving the existing ties.<sup>14</sup> Immediately after the war the neoliberals took up where they had left off, with Friedrich von Hayek being the main protagonist. By that time, Hayek was one of the most prominent academics worldwide and he was well-known within both the English-language and German-language academic world. Born in Austria-Hungary in the early 1920's, he earned doctorate degrees in both law and political science at the University of Vienna, in addition to which he had also studied philosophy, psychology and economics. After among others a brief spell as a research assistant in the United States, Hayek joined the London School of Economics (LSE) in 1931, where only one year later he was named Professor of Economic Sciences. In the two following decades, he quickly rose further in the academic world, not in the least due to his debates with the leading British economist John Maynard Keynes. The combination of a diverse academic background in the two major academic languages of the time, with experience on both sides of the Atlantic, gave Hayek the perfect profile for finding a complementary group of likeminded academics. On top of that, his bestseller The Road to Serfdom (1944)<sup>15</sup> made him a well-known public figure too. In this book, Hayek argues that socialist ideas of central planning and government controls will ultimately <sup>11</sup> The idea to create the institute was suggested by Marcel Bourgouis. Rougier would manage the institute, and the plan was that Röpke, Hayek and Lippmann would lead the different chapters. Whether the more conservative participants objected to the idea of creating the institute, or whether they withheld themselves from any involvement, is not known.

always lead to tyranny and a loss of individual freedom. It is important to note here that it is not the original publication that made an impact on the public at large, but a heavy re-work by America's most widely circulating magazine: the Reader's Digest.<sup>16</sup> This re-work overly simplified the original work and cherry picked his arguments to better suit the Reader's Digest's anticommunist editors. Contrary to public perception even these days, Hayek's original was a rather nuanced book, with qualifications abound.<sup>17</sup>

Already before the end of the Second World War Hayek had been planning to create a society along the lines of what would become the Mont Pèlerin Society (MPS). Once the changing circumstances of the time after the Second World War allowed him to, it was time to put his plans into motion. Relying on his extensive network and his excellent reputation, Hayek invited a wide range of intellectuals to exchange their views on the contemporary relation between freedom and the state in a very broad sense. These intellectuals came from all sorts of academic backgrounds, covering fields from philosophy to economics and from history to politicology. Besides, the thirty-six members were evenly distributed between Europeans and Americans, the latter of which were sponsored by the Volker Fund. In 1947 they all made the journey to a resort located at the Swiss mountain of Mont Pèlerin, the name giver of the society. The invitees included some Germans that would play an important role in the development of the German strand of neoliberalism called 'ordoliberalism'. Most notable were Wilhelm Röpke and Walter Eucken, who were present at the very first meeting in 1947. Soon others joined their ranks, such as Alfred Müller-Armack, Ludwig Erhard and Alexander von Rüstow. Other interesting figures included Ludwig von Mises, Michael Polanyi, Karl Popper, Milton Friedman and Albert Hunold, who was the co-founder together with Hayek. Although most of them self-identified as liberals, this wide selection of academics cannot simply be classified as such, for their views differed too greatly among them. However, the big binding factor of this diverse society is that all its members agreed with the necessity of discussing those matters which were ultimately reflected in the written aims of the society's foundation.<sup>18</sup>

The society's statement of aims first describes that their members fear the development of diminishing freedom in contemporary societies. To revert this development, no clear alternative was agreed upon. Therefore, instead, the statement of aims included certain matters that have to be studied further. These matters were characteristics of a society that most MPS members believed were necessary for a free society, such as the rule of law, no misuse of history, and an international order to safeguard peace and harmonious international economic relations. They rejected totalitarianism, defended the market mechanism and stressed the importance of moral absolutes. Many members preferred to sing a somewhat different tune by including some more progressive ideas, as they feared that their society would otherwise seem to be defending laissez-faire liberalism. However, for they did not reach consensus on these matters, they were left out of the statement of aims.<sup>19</sup>

In the final paragraph of the statement of aims the MPS reveals how the society wants to achieve the 'goals' mentioned above:

'The group does not aspire to conduct propaganda. It seeks to establish no meticulous and hampering orthodoxy. It aligns itself with no particular party. Its object is solely, by facilitating the exchange of views among minds inspired by certain ideals and broad conceptions held in common, to contribute to the preservation and improvement of the free society.'<sup>20</sup>

Exactly in line with the spirit of these last words, throughout the years the Mont Pèlerin Society was a recurring platform where ideas about the foundations of liberalism were thoroughly discussed. It was not a fanboys' network of one interpretation of liberalism, instead the platform was used to critically examine negative aspects of certain flavours of liberalism, such as the potentially morally damaging influences of the market mechanism. All these discussions also had the goals to come up with a new and better form of liberalism. After all, the public at large closely associated the term 'liberalism' with the hugely unpopular old excesses of laissez-faire. This also meant that all MPS members agreed not only to improve the material ideas of liberalism, but also to label it differently. Although the society's members could not reach consensus, most agreed to use the term 'neoliberalism', which is also the principal term that has been used for referring to the ideas of the members of the MPS.<sup>21</sup>

The ideas that the MPS members express, have been referred to as 'neoliberalism'. However, these ideas changed over the years, and so did the society's members. With the society's success, more and more people wanted to become a member, leading to the situation that the society had to actually turn down applicants as opposed to the initial quest for new members. From a cosy small-scale society, in which all members knew each other by name, the influx of new members gradually but markedly altered the composition of the society. Relatively more and more Americans joined the club, and economists soon had the clear majority over academics with other backgrounds. The changing composition is one reason why the deeper, more philosophic debates about neoliberalism gave way to more technical discussions about the market mechanism. Another reason was that (neo)liberalism had found its way out of the line of fire and was blossoming in academic, political and public perception. Coincidentally a clear majority started to take shape within the Mont Pèlerin Society that refuted any progressive elements into (neo)liberalism. Like Mises they seemed to stick a lot closer to the original ideas of laissez-faire, where less government and more market seemed to be the only answer to any contemporary issue. The changing direction of the MPS accelerated because the changing direction itself prompted disappointed members to distance themselves from the society, which further tilted the balance within the MPS in the radical pro-market idealists. The fate of MPS's changed direction was finally sealed when Milton Friedman assumed a leading intellectual role starting in the later years of the '50s. Friedman, who had excellent connections with the media and highly placed politicians, was a fierce protagonist of the extreme pro-market ideas. He himself called his ideas 'radical liberalism', although the outside world most often still called it neoliberalism. For convenience sake, the term is used that some of his colleagues also did and which is sometimes used in contemporary literature as well: 'paleoliberalism'<sup>22</sup>. At this point it

<sup>22</sup> Though this term has a somewhat negative tone, it unmistakably refers to the later more extreme ideas of the members of the MPS and cannot be confused with other radical flavours of liberalism, such as laissezshould be clear that internationally the main development of liberalism in the post-war period is the one from a diverse forum that deeply discussed the many roots of liberal theories to a group of likeminded economists that advocated pro-market solutions. In other words: neoliberalism developed into paleoliberalism.<sup>23</sup>

SII.2 Ordoliberalism – the German branch of neoliberalism

SII.2.1 Germany before, during and directly after the Second World War

Alongside the described international developments in liberalism, it is important to keep the specific German historical background in mind in order to fully understand the rise of ordoliberalism. Since Germany's unification in 1871 under Otto van Bismarck's leadership, the country had not had many policies in place that were inspired by liberalism. Until the defeat and collapse of the German Empire in the First World War, laissez-faire was seen as an anarchy which would ultimately lead to Marxism and international class war. Trade and commerce were severely restricted. Instead the government stood up for special interests, above all for big industrial and agrarian corporations. With those big corporations organising production, unnecessary losses caused by competition would be prevented. Besides, this economic system could easily be steered in order to serve the national interest. Moreover, 'corporatism' would bring harmony by uniting labourers with their natural leaders.<sup>24</sup>

After the First World War, the Weimar Republic was founded. Also this short period in the history of Germany, which lasted until Hitler's assumption of power in 1933, was characterised by little preference for liberal ideas and policies. During this politically unstable period nationalistic ideas dominated most parties. Even for the liberal parties, issues like free trade and more competition were only of secondary importance. As an example, nationalist liberals saw cartels as a symbol of power of the strong over the weak.

faire liberalism. Besides, calling something radical would present a comparable problem, as it can give a false impression of attributing a positive connotation to it.

Even more striking is the fact that most laissez-faire<sup>25</sup> economists considered cartels to be nothing more than an exponent of the freedom of contract. During this period there had only been a few attempts to inhibit abuse by these cartels, but inadvertently these attempts led to further monopolisation.<sup>26</sup>

Times for (neo)liberals were even harder under Hitler's leadership. The regime made it difficult for proclaimed liberals to continue life as usual. This prompted many of them to emigrate to countries such as the US, the UK, Switzerland and Turkey. Those who stayed, risked being fired or at least lost all prospects of making promotion, especially in the first years of the nazi takeover. The (neo)liberals that were less idealistic, took a more pragmatic approach. Some simply gave Hitler's regime the benefit of the doubt, also due to its confident enthusiasm which coincided with unprecedented economic growth. In particular Hitler's tackling of the war reparations was valued highly. Other pragmatist (neo)liberals considered the political change an excellent opportunity to influence the new regime. Either they tried to push the regime towards more (neo)liberal policies, or they simply tried to secure their jobs or promotions. Throughout the years, the nazi regime became ever more repressive, violent and power hungry. These experiences on the one hand reinforced the neoliberals' belief in the importance of the struggle of freedom against collectivism. On the other hand, these experiences also increased their sympathy for the masses, which brought the ideas of social justice further to the fore.<sup>27</sup>

As is widely known, the Second World War brought about large-scale destruction throughout the whole of Europe, with the losing German side obviously not as an exception. Railways, bridges and all sorts of other transportation and communication infrastructure had been destroyed. Even many residential areas were heavily wrecked by Allied strategic bombing, causing great housing shortages immediately following the war. The influx of about 7.5 million German refugees from east of the Oder-Neisse line further worsened this housing crisis, on top of creating all sorts of other problems en tensions in the German society, including the economy. Unsurprisingly also the industry was hit heavily, although not as bad as sometimes thought, for during the war the Germans had some success preserving their precious assets by hiding these or by moving factories literally underground. However, Allied' policies immediately after the war offset this marginal success. Many industry assets that made it through the war, had to be dismantled or were simply left to rust.<sup>28</sup>

When talking about Germany immediately after the Second World War, one has to be clear about what one exactly means.. Several large stretches of land were lost to other nations, the most eye-catching being the former Prussian lands east of the Oder-Neisse line. The parts that remained in German possession, were divided into several occupation zones. The Soviets occupied what later became East-Germany<sup>29</sup>, with its particular communist economy. In this research the focus is on West-Germany though, as with hindsight can be said that the eastern side has had a markedly different economic history than the western side. For convenience sake: 'German' and 'Germany' will therefore only refer to West-Germans and West-Germany, unless stated otherwise. West-Germany was occupied in three main occupational zones of influence: a British zone, an American zone and a French zone.<sup>30</sup> In 1947 the former two zones merged into 'Bizone', and halfway 1948 France joined as well to complete West-Germany<sup>31</sup>. Although West-Germany was already whole in 1948, it took until 1955 for the country to have its full sovereignty back. Over the years the Germans gradually regained more and more powers. Directly after the war, the several occupying countries fully decided the economic policies though.<sup>32</sup>

The policies of the Allies were to strictly control the economy, both to keep the country under their control and because they genuinely believed these economic policies were most beneficial for the local population. Because the several occupying powers did not fully harmonise their policies, barricades arised that hampered economic recovery. Other than minor problems like the high barriers to move across the newly drawn (occupational) borders, these barricades also greatly exacerbated food supply issues. With the Soviet forces forbidding grain exports, West-Germany was namely cut off from its granary that were the old East-Prussian lands. The Allies tried to combat the resulting hunger and all the previously named challenges, like the housing shortages, with strict rationing and governmental planning. At the same time the Reichsmark had grown to be nearly worthless, which caused people to barter. Instead of selling products and services for worthless Reichsmarks, many preferred going to the countryside to barter for extra food. Others spent time along the railroad track in search for coals, instead of spending time at their ordinary jobs. On an individual level these examples make sense, but on a macro-level it was disastrous for the economy. Moreover, many entrepreneurs and industrials withheld large parts of their stocks from sales, for on top of the problems with the Reichsmark the occupational authorities made importing and exporting extremely difficult and often nonsensical. German exporters could only receive the exact domestic worth of their products in Reichsmark, thereby removing any incentive to export. At the same time, foreign importers had to buy these goods for a much higher value in dollars, which in addition were very scarce in Europe anyway. For German importers, the same problem existed. If these were not enough obstacles for international trade, the Allied Joint Export-Import Agency had to improve every single transaction and had the sole authority of deciding both the internal and external value of the transaction. To end with a few positive economic circumstances of the time, Germany still had access to a more than sufficient number of highly trained labourers. In addition, despite the dismantling policies Germany was still home to a wide range of strong industries. However, directly after the Second World War, both the overall state of the economy and its prospects were very gloomy.<sup>33</sup>

SII.2.2 The ordoliberals

After the Second World War a group of German academics emerged that would become known as 'ordoliberals', named after the academic journal they set up and used to publish their ideas: ORDO – Jahrbuch für die Ordnung von Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, or in short just 'ORDO'. Like the name suggests<sup>34</sup>, the published articles in the year-book cover how the economy and society should be arranged. According to the ordoliberals a planned economy was not the way to go, as it would turn everyone into slaves of the bureaucracy. Moreover, they took a clear position against the laissez-faire economy, for in their eyes a concentration of private economic power would not be any less harmful economically and socially than a dirigiste state. The ordoliberals found their ideal in between the two. According to them, a strong state is needed to have an optimally functioning market. A market economy is the most efficient system for allocating resources where they are needed the most. However, because this system can be abused and because it often leads to socially undesirable results, a strong framework needs to be created that prevents the coming about of such results. Besides, this framework needs to make sure there is enough room for a market to flourish. Competition should be guaranteed, for example by combatting monopolies and cartels. The role of the state is to create and uphold this framework. Altogether the ordoliberals call this system the ‘social market economy’, or ‘die soziale Marktwirtschaft’. To be clear, the element that makes this form of market economy ‘social’ is not just the fact that the state has an important role in this system. It is the ascribed socially optimal results of the whole system that do. The framework of the state should namely be designed to prevent socially unacceptable laissez-faire excesses. Besides, in the social market economy the state has the role to compensate the losers of the market and thus create more socially desirable results. In general, the ordoliberals agreed that this compensation should be designed in such a manner that it does not distort the market system, although different ordoliberals favoured different flavours.<sup>35</sup>

In ORDO the ordoliberals mainly discussed all the different aspects that had to do with the social market economy. As ordoliberalism is not a strict ideology, it is better to view this school of thought as a group of independent thinkers that agreed on the general principles of how an economy is to function optimally. On the details these thinkers had different degrees of opinion, and ORDO was the main platform to discuss these differences. In addition, of course the ordoliberals did not restrain themselves from offering views outside the scope of the social market economy. For instance, they often stressed the importance of a stable currency, explained their preference of international openness over nationalism, and showed relatively high concern for the interests of the common masses. However, the social market economy was definitely the principal theme.<sup>36</sup>

Already from the outset in 1948 ORDO was by far the most used and most influential magazine for propagating ordoliberal thoughts and it has been publishing its yearbooks until this very day. In the remainder of this paragraph, the ordoliberal heavyweights of the first decades of the postwar era are spotlighted. For every heavyweight a brief personal history and a small selection of his<sup>37</sup> most notable topics are provided. Both provide possibilities of comparisons in the next chapters; the latter also exemplifies what ordoliberalism is all about.

§1.2.2.1 Walter Eucken

Walter Eucken is one of the two founder-editors of ORDO. As such, he qualifies to be included among the main ordoliberal advocates. In addition, even though his untimely death in 1950 gave him only a few years of direct influence after the Second World War, his indirect influences persevered via his prior teachings, publications and his leading role of the Freiburg School of Economics.

Walter Eucken was born and raised in Wilhelmine Jena. He grew up in an outspoken intellectual<sup>38</sup>, elitist<sup>39</sup> and Lutheran environment. After doing the bulk of his economics studies in Jena and Kiel, he deliberately applied for Bonn to study under the auspices of Heinrich Dietzel. Dietzel was namely one of the few academics in Germany

<sup>36</sup> Illustrative of the centrality of the social market economy are the forewords of the several yearbooks. The foreword of the second yearbook starts the following way: 'Im Vorwort zum ersten Band von ORDO ist mit Nachdruck betont worden, daß die Aufgabe, der das Jahrbuch dient, mit einer grundsätzlichen Darlegung der Idee der Wettbewerbsordnung noch keineswegs gelöst ist; (...)' (highlights added, MW). Sidenote: in the first years ORDO mainly used the term 'Wettbewerbsordnung', or 'competition economy'. The term 'social market economy' overtook this phrasing throughout the years. This also has to do with the first priorities of the ordoliberals after the Second World War. For more information, see §1.2.3. See ORDO. Jahrbuch für die Ordnung von Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, zweiter Band, Düsseldorf: Helmut Küpper vormals Georg Bondi 1949, vol. 2, p. IX; Nicholls 1994, p. 115-116, 145-146; Burgin 2012, p. 82-85.

<sup>39</sup> Walter grew up in a big villa and looked down upon the common masses, especially until the Second World War.

that taught classic liberal economics, as opposed to the mainstream historical school of economics. In Bonn Eucken received his first doctorate degree. Soon afterwards the First World War started, during which Eucken was an army officer. When the war was over, Eucken took up a modest post at the University of Berlin, where he ultimately received his professor title in 1921. The first few years of his academic career he kept a low profile, but once Germany's hyperinflation problems grew, he stepped up and wrote a well-received critique of the country's monetary policy. That was the real starting point of Eucken's rising influence. Other than producing more well-read publications, he became a common invitee to several (secret) committees that had to advise on (monetary) economic issues.<sup>40</sup>

After a brief spell in Tübingen, Eucken took the economics chair in Freiburg in 1927, where he stayed until his death. During this period he obviously met many interesting figures, but three of them stand out due to their influence on Eucken's thinking: Edmund Husserl, Hans Grossmann-Doerth and Franz Böhm. Husserl was a logical philosopher that prompted Eucken to link economics with other theories about human behaviour. Grossmann-Doerth and Böhm underlined the pivotal role law has in the economy. Whereas many of his contemporaries often assumed that the law simply reflected economic practices, Eucken became fully convinced that a strong legal framework greatly furthers competition and therefore makes the economy work efficiently.<sup>41</sup>

As leader of the Freiburg School Eucken did not give in to Nazi pressures. He cleverly hid his critiques on the regime, for example by using overly technical narratives that were incomprehensible to the nazi layman. Another trick was moulding his critique into discussing how the radically different transitional economy after the war should look like, without specifying the winner. Eucken's preferred transition was a two phase procedure. In the first the government should replace the production of war products by the production of consumer goods. Phase two meant removing trade barriers and actually

<sup>40</sup> For example, Eucken was a member of both the executive committee an association of economists and businessmen that promoted the market economy (the German League for Free Economic Policy / Deutscher Bund für freie Wirtschaftspolitik) and of a crisis management group set up by the Reichsbank; Nicholls 1994, p. 32-34, 40, 43.

introducing the consumer based market economy. Of course he had many other ideas throughout the years with which he continuously fed the minds of yet another generation of students. One of these ideas is his whole approach of economics. Eucken firmly believed in rationalism and economics as a science. He promoted the use of general theories and stressed the need to always view the economy as a whole when coming up with policies. More specifically, his ideas were all about the promotion of the market economy with a strong framework provided by the state. He was a little more hesitant than most ordoliberalists when it came to structural social interventions, as he feared interventions would be concessions to vested interests. Moreover, Eucken attached much weight to monetary policies, where he promoted a balanced state budget, the need to get rid of the excessive purchasing power of the Reichsmark, and the need of a stable currency. In addition, he viewed monetary ideas along the line of what later became the Bretton-Woods plan as the way to expand world trade.<sup>42</sup>

§1.2.2 Franz Böhm

Franz Böhm is the other founder-editor of ORDO. Other than that, he deserves to be included among the main ordoliberal advocates due to both his academic contributions and his political influence. As an academic his main contributions to ordoliberalism have been the embedding of anti-cartel and anti-monopolistic ideas, plus emphasising the role of law in the functioning of the market economy.

Shortly after his birth in Konstanz in 1895, his family took Franz Böhm to Karlsruhe because his father became a minister in Baden's government. His father an Old Catholic and his mother an Evangelic, Böhm was raised a Protestant in the latter city. Following his graduation at the local humanistic grammar school, Böhm quickly joined the army ranks in the First World War. Surviving the war, he moved to nearby Freiburg to study law and political science. Following his graduation, he spent a few months in the same city as a public prosecutor, before moving to Berlin to work for the economics ministry of the Weimar Republic. In this six-year spell starting in 1925 he worked at the cartel department, which proved to be an essential experience. From close by he observed how cartels and monopolies harmed everyday economic life. This prompted Böhm to write a second dissertation, once more at the University of Freiburg. In this dissertation he argued that both cartels and monopolies were harmful to the economy, because they severely obstructed competition. This challenge should be solved by radical reforms of the law, which would give the state the power to properly challenge the cartels and monopolies. Instead of protection big business and special interest groups, the law should protect competition. These ideas convinced many former supporters of laissez-faire and they would later become central tenets of the social market economy.<sup>43</sup>

In his second spell in Freiburg Böhm quickly worked his way up and became a professor. Together with his good friend Eucken he set up the Freiburg School of economics and became an influential figure, despite the withdrawal of his teaching rights by the Nazi regime in 1938. After the Second World War he quickly took up his old post again in 1946 and he would remain bonded to the University of Freiburg, although his political career let it tick over for a while. To concretise Böhm's political career's highs: in 1945-1946 he was the minister of cultural affairs in Hessen and from 1953 to 1965 he was a member of the Bundestag for the CDU.<sup>44</sup>

§1.2.2.3 Wilhelm Röpke

Already before the Second World War, Wilhelm Röpke was an active member of the community that wanted to improve and revive liberal ideas. He was one of the attendees of the Colloque and, after staying in contact with Hayek during the war on how to proceed afterwards, he was one of the founding members of the Mont Pèlerin Society. In the latter he became the president in 1961, but due to disagreement with the direction the Society was heading, he stepped down a year later. Directly after the Second World War, Röpke had a short-lived project of creating something with a similar function to what ORDO would ultimately have. Röpke created an international academic journal called 'Occident', which should promote his form of neoliberal ideas. However, this project was not successful, which may have something to do with its elitist tendencies, such as expecting readers to be trilingual (German, French, English). A few years later Röpke joined Eucken en Böhm with their ORDO-project and become a member of the advisory board. He was also one of the personal advisors of both Adenauer and Erhard.<sup>45</sup>

Röpke grew up within a liberal family in the protestant North of Germany. After serving in the army in the First World War, he started with his studies of law and political sciences in Göttingen. Via Tübingen he found his way to Marburg, where he did economics instead. With 24 years of age he became the youngest professor in Germany, with chairs in Marburg, Jena and Graz (Austria). In 1933 he fled to Istanbul, where he worked as a professor for a few years, before moving to Geneva in Switzerland, where he would live until his death. Especially from the latter safe environment he knew to reach a sizable crowd within the German-language world through his prolific productions in mostly Swiss, but also incidentally German newspapers. Despite nazi censorship and the fact that Swiss newspapers were not widely available, Röpke could spread his ideas this way.<sup>46</sup>

On the whole Röpke was clearly an ordoliberal. He was looking for a ‘third way’ between collectivism and the old liberalism and found this in a combination of a market economy what he called ‘liberal interventionism’. The price mechanism is best suited for creating just outcomes, but these outcomes are not perfect. The state can intervene, but such interventions should be in harmony with economic development. The state should protect the market to ensure free competition, besides fighting against monopolies, corruption and other distortions. Moreover, the state has a role to play in providing several public goods which should be state monopolies, such as a police force, foreign affairs, public health and electricity. After the Second World War, when Röpke regularly returned to Germany, he stressed the importance of getting rid of all price controls as quickly as possible, plus promoting measures that would lead to a stable (new) currency.<sup>47</sup>

Röpke also had his particular topics and ideas of interest, as a result of which he was described as both a radical and a conservative. More so than most of his ordoliberal equals, he was very interested in ethics and religion, and how these relate to the ordoliberal ideas. Humans in his view were religious beings and therefore it would be necessary that the market in both its workings and its outcomes could be reconciled with the spiritual nature of mankind. He feared that the market would lead to a social environment where every kind of morality would be conceivable. In this light one should see Röpkes plea for restricting the market mechanism to particular fields. Or in other words: the state should intervene or control here. A big example of this is Röpkes plea for the protection of the family farm and small local economies from the power of capitalism. The key to a free society is to have as many economic independent people as possible, and economies of scale and scope are overrated. The more equal a society, the bigger the market, the faster capital grows. To help small farmers and economies, the government should, for instance, provide them trainings so they can adapt to the new market circumstances. Röpke also somewhat feared the power of the market of democracy, which could lead to restrictions of the market or minorities and thereby lead to despotism and less freedom. The solution for this would be more legal protections; a self-regulating market is nonsense and only politicises the economy.<sup>48</sup>

§1.2.2.4 Alexander Rüstow

Alexander Rüstow is another member of the advisory board of ORDO. Just like Röpke he was also active in the pre-war efforts of enlivening liberal ideas. He attended the Colloque and became a member of the Mont Pèlerin Society, where he too left because of his disappointment with the paleoliberal direction the Society was taking under Milton Friedman. Rüstow is well-known for adding some social elements into ordoliberalism.<sup>49</sup>

Rüstow was born and raised in Prussia by his strictly nationalistic father and strictly protestant mother. He had a very broad intellectual basis, with studying mathematics, physics, philosophy, economics, law and classical philology in Göttingen, München and Berlin. After he obtained his doctorate in philosophy in Erlangen, he briefly worked as the academical leader at a publisher in Leipzig, before returning to pursuing purely academical studies. Like most of his contemporaries, he joined the military in the First World War. Seeing the senselessness of the war, he started to favour socialism. He even participated in the failed German revolution in 1918. A year later he started working for the Ministry of Economics as an advisor for general economic questions, where he was one of the forces behind the anti-cartel regulations. After five years he quit his position, because he became too disappointed with both bureaucratic red tape and the power of lobbyists. From then until 1933 he worked as a judicial advisor for the Verein deutscher Maschinenbau-Anstalten (Association of German Engineering Manufacturers), where he gradually moved his political preference from right-wing socialism to socialistic liberalism. In 1929 Rüstow became a member of the executive committee of the Deutscher Bund für freie Wirtschaftspolitik (German League for Free Economic Policy), together with Eucken, among others. Röpke was also a member. The three have been in touch since, and had lively conversations about improving and resurrecting liberalism.<sup>50</sup>

Throughout the years Rüstow built quite the reputation for himself. Just before Hitler took over, the then Chancellor asked Rüstow to become his new Minister of Economics. It was all too late and Rüstow was placed on a list of people to purge immediately after the nazi take-over. He decided to flee to Istanbul, just like Röpke, where the two kept in close touch. Rüstow also regularly interchanged letters with Eucken there.<sup>51</sup>

Although Rüstow changed to being a liberal who favoured the market mechanism, he had always kept an interest in social justice and saw the negative aspects of a free market. Strongly believing in the economic and moral benefits of a more equal spread of wealth, he favoured some ideas that his ordoliberal colleagues thought were too radical. Many were ultimately accepted in a toned down version though. Rüstow for instance saw that the market could never achieve an equitable allocation of wealth, which redistribution could. Because the latter is incompatible with the free market, Rüstow saw the solution in what he called Startgleichheit and Startgerechtigkeit. This amounted to making sure everyone could only start his life with a certain maximum amount of wealth, this way also ensuring a minimum for everyone. This extreme form of inheritance regulation was never implemented, although milder forms of inheritance taxes were. Due to his experiences on both the public and the private side of society, Rüstow was also slightly more pronounced than most of his equals, on the importance of having a strong state that was both above the economy and removed from interest groups.<sup>52</sup>

§1.2.2.5 Alfred Müller-Armack

Among the ordoliberalists, Alfred Müller-Armack could be described as the odd one out. Before he emerged as one of the key ordoliberalists, he was not a well-distinguished professor like the others, and he did not have a history of promoting a third way in between socialism and fascism. On the contrary, of the famous ordoliberalists Müller-Armack was the only one to join the Nazi party. His later actions and influence make him instrumental in realising ordoliberal ideals, though.<sup>53</sup>

Müller-Armack was born and raised in a protestant middle-class family in Essen. Being slightly younger than the other liberals, he was just young enough to escape having to serve during the First World War. He studied economics in Gießen, Freiburg, München and Cologne. In 1924 he obtained his doctorate in Cologne and received his license to teach at the university in 1926. His mentor, Leopold von Wiese, worked on what he called 'social liberalism' and sparked Müller-Armack's further interest in social questions. After working in Cologne for a while, he became a professor of economics in 1934. Subsequently, he moved to Münster to take up a seat at the university there in 1940. One of the reasons that made it possible for him to become a professor at these institutes, had been his choice to join the NSDAP. If one looks at his writings before the nazi period, other than simply believing his dissociating remarks after the war, it is safe to say this choice was probably made more for reasons of opportunism than because of any strong pro-fascist views. Although in some papers Müller-Armack showed some corporatist tendencies, in others he appeared to dislike cartels. In other words, his writings were not really outspoken and sometimes it was hard to pinpoint his exact beliefs. What is quite clear though, is that he was in favour of a market economy and that he was sensitive for social issues.<sup>54</sup>

Also due to his nazi party membership, Müller-Armack made his way into several additional functions. One of the nazi industry groups, the Wirtschaftsgruppe for textiles in Westphalia, wanted to set up a research institute that had to do research about the textile market. The institute, which was affiliated with the University of Münster as well, was to be lead by Müller-Armack. He was also appointed as the director of a research unit for the study of urban settlement and housing policy (Forschungsstelle für Siedlungs- und Wohnungswesen). His experiences in these different roles gave him not only valuable leadership skills, both also privileged insights in the working of the nazi price controls. These insights led Müller-Armack to detest the controls, although he did not utter them openly and disguised them in criticism on marxism, which he despised anyway.<sup>55</sup>

The nazi's permitted Müller-Armack to receive the Neue Zürcher Zeitung, one of the Swiss newspapers in which Röpke often published. Therefore Müller-Armack was constantly informed about the state of the war. At some point he decided it would be safer to move his research institute towards the Dutch border. There he received help from his Dutch protestant friends for printing and distributing his views to otherwise unreachable colleagues in Germany. While his disappointment with the nazi's gradually grew, he secretly sought more and more time to put his views black on white, and to make a coherent story out of these.<sup>56</sup>

In 1947 he finally published this work, called 'Wirtschaftslenkung und Marktwirtschaft'<sup>57</sup>, which roughly translates as 'Guidance/Governance of the Economy and Market Economy'. In this book he first has a look at the then economy, where he blames socialism and nationalism for the world-wide drop in production. Looking for a solution, he refers to Hayek's A Road to Serfdom, arguing that a commanded economy will lead to an unwanted concentration of power. Laissez-faire policies were not an option either, for they were incompatible with the then contemporary values. Referring to the likes of Eucken, Böhm, Röpke and other ordoliberals, he states there is academic consensus on how to heal the economy, namely the reintroduction of free prices and market forces. Müller-Armack then introduced his concept of what he called the 'Soziale Marktwirtschaft'. The social market economy would not be a mix of socialism and the free market, but it involved a fundamentally free market economy that was corrected with measures where necessary. The corrections had to be in correspondence with market principles though.<sup>58</sup>

For creating the social market economy, first some steps had to be taken that mostly had to do with the relation Germany had with its occupiers. Examples of these included: returning the right to trade with other countries; stopping the policy of dismantling German industry; currency reform; creating a German agency that would be empowered with deciding upon economic and financial policy, without interference by the occupiers; the creation of a German central bank. He then provided a whole catalogue of concrete policy measures that together would constitute the social market economy. Because his proposals served as probably the most important guideline for the actual policies that had been pursued in the subsequent years, it is useful to quickly go through many of these proposals. They included: obviously, replacing price controls<sup>59</sup> by the free market; legally protecting competition, for instance by strongly regulating monopolies and by forbidding the abuse of economic power; promoting the issuance of credit, which should stabilise the economy; providing social housing and allowing the creation of bottom-up building corporations; abolition of rental controls, combined with rent subsidies for the poor; further reducing inequality in society by taxation and awarding family allowances; giving employees social participation rights in their companies, for both social and productivity reasons; introducing a minimum wage and facilitating contract negotiations; improving the social security system; incentivising people to set up their own small farm or business. As you can see, according to Müller-Armack the market is not a natural phenomenon, but a man-made construction.<sup>60</sup>

§1.2.3 Ludwig Erhard & the Materialisation of the Social Market Economy

Ludwig Erhard is the last and arguably the most influential ordoliberal champion. It is not his contributions to ordoliberal theory that were so impressive, but his role in actually implementing ordoliberal policies. The importance of Erhard and his fundamentally different role earn him a separate section in this thesis, dedicated just to him and his endeavours as Minister of Economics and later as Chancellor of the Federal Republic.

<sup>59</sup> Bread, milk, fat and rents for the elderly were the only 'goods' that had to be excepted to the general rule of 'no price controls'.

Erhard was born and raised in Fürth, a small city next to Nürnberg. His father a catholic and his mother a protestant, Erhard was baptised a protestant. After successfully finishing his education to become a linen merchant, he had to join the ranks in the First World War. At the infamous front around Ypres he got heavily injured, and became physically unable to work in his father's drapery. His future plans had to be changed, so Erhard decided to upgrade his degree at the university of applied sciences in Nürnberg, also within the field of commerce. His main teacher, Wilhelm Riegel, strongly believed in the market mechanism as bringing the only just price, and also underscored the importance of a stable currency. Subsequently Erhard obtained his doctorate at the University of Frankfurt in 1925, under Franz Oppenheimer. Oppenheimer, both a sociologist and an economist, had developed a typical ideology, which he called 'liberal socialism'. Like the neoliberals, he rejected Marxism and laissez-faire capitalism. According to him, monopolies were terrible and also big landowners ruined proper free competition. Yes, Oppenheimer strongly favoured free competition, but it was the state that had to ensure this. Property had to be distributed equally and other necessary means had to be taken to ensure that as many people as possible would participate in the market process. In Oppenheimer, Erhard thus had a teacher that taught him ideas that were very similar to what the ordoliberalists furthered, albeit without the more philosophical underpinnings that warn for collectivism.<sup>61</sup>

In 1928 Erhard started to work at a research institute, called the 'Institut für Wirtschaftsbeobachtung für deutschen Fertigware', where he collected and published data on consumption and marketing of end products. During this work Erhard also regularly came in contact with Müller-Armack, who worked at a similar institute in Münster. Disagreeing with the nazi policies of the time, at work Erhard embarked upon formulating the policies Germany had to pursue once it was peace time again. Although he did not explicitly speak out against the nazi regime, this finally cost him his position in 1942. With the help of some industrial sponsors, Erhard continued this work at the research institute he set up himself, the 'Institut für Industrieforschung'. He still had to be careful with his phrasing in order not to have the nazi regime meddling with his institute for 'industry research'. Still, he sent around his ideas to many businesses, and also the underground was aware of Erhard's work. His ideas were very similar to that of the other ordoliberals. If one wants to distinguish his flavour from the others, one could say he was preoccupied more with reintroducing the market mechanism than with introducing social components. Indeed, Erhard had even said that the 'social market economy' does not mean the market has to be made social. Rather, it meant that the market is inherently social. Furthermore, Erhard often focused on the possibilities of increased consumerism, for example by easing the issuance of consumer credits.<sup>62</sup>

After the Americans freed Bavaria from the nazi regime, soon a state government needed to be installed. The then prime minister was still looking for a candidate for the post of Minister of Economics. The Americans pushed for Erhard, both because of his clean record, and because they hoped he could provide a counterweight for the socialist elements in the government. Erhard and the prime minister accepted. The former only kept his post for approximately a year though, because subsequent elections lead to a government coalition of a different colour. The new coalition, led by the 'Christlich-Soziale Union' (CSU), were hostile to Erhard and his policies. Despite being overthrown by the later sister party of the CDU after such a brief period, Erhard gained practical experience in reforming an economy. In 1947 the Bizonal commission created a commission that had to look into the possibilities in the German zones for currency reform, the 'Sonderstelle Geld und Kredit'. A proposal of a member of the FDP was accepted and Erhard was to become its leader. He made a good impression here, and when the top position of the Economic Council of Bizonal<sup>63</sup> became available, Erhard became one of the candidates. Nevertheless, the SPD and the communists all did not favour him. On the other hand, the CDU did, although they opted for another candidate because its Bavarian sister party were also hostile to Erhard here. Because both voting blocks did not have a majority, the FDP was kingmaker. Also in this situation, it was the FDP that proposed Erhard. In the end the non-socialist block could agree on this candidate.<sup>64</sup>

<sup>63</sup> The Economic Council can be considered the Ministry of Economics of Bizonal, albeit with severely fewer powers than a normal ministry, due to the occupation.

Under the leadership of Erhard, the Economic Council created an academic advisory board, the 'Wissenschaftlicher Beirat bei der Verwaltung von Wirtschaft'. The idea behind this was to create an organ that could sway the occupational powers into supporting policies that were more favourable for the Germans. Amongst others, Eucken, Böhm, Müller-Armack and some other ordoliberalists<sup>65</sup> took seat in this advisory board. Supported by the advisory board, Erhard tried to remove price controls as quickly as possible, in addition to trying to remove trade controls. Hereby he often overstepped his official powers, much against particularly Britain's wishes. Both the Americans and the British saw both kind of controls as ways of keeping the Germans in check. Moreover, Britain firmly believed in the effectiveness dirigist policies anyway. Creating and subsequently using a loophole in currency reform legislation, Erhard ridded the economy of practically all price controls. This immediately lead to the famous 'shop-window miracle', when all stocked up products were put on the counter again. As a result, the economy suddenly sprang to life again.<sup>66</sup>

Unsurprisingly, Erhard became a very popular public figure. Therefore Adenauer, who would become Germany's first chancellor after the Second World War, tried to convince Erhard to be placed on the CDU slate. Adenauer not only thought this would lead to a popularity boost of the CDU, but that it would also keep the party itself as far away from the socialist track as possible. Adenauer's ideas could be considered a component on the right-wing of the CDU, and he wanted to prevent cooperation with the SPD on any level at all costs. Erhard, not particularly liking the CSU, was in doubt. On the one hand, the obvious choice would be to join the FDP, which was ideologically much closer to him. Besides, the FDP was the party that helped him twice to make a big jump in his career. However, Erhard was ultimately convinced by Adenauer's arguments.<sup>67</sup> In private correspondence to FDP leaders, he confessed he made the choice out of opportunism. He thought by joining the future winners of the elections, he could keep Germany on the right, anti-dirigist road. Erhard was right. The CDU won the first elections and Erhard became <sup>67</sup> Erhard was put on the list for the CDU. Interestingly, he never became an official member of the party, not even when he became the party leader.

Germany's first postwar Minister of Economics in 1949. From that moment on, he could focus on fulfilling the social market economy. Röpke was one of his main advisors and he even appointed Müller-Armack as head of the economics department of his Ministry of Economics. The reforms went smoothly, for they resulted in the famous Wirtschaftswunder. The CDU kept winning elections, and Erhard was to stay in his position until 1963. He did not just resign for any reason. No, Erhard succeeded Adenauer as federal chancellor of West-Germany and kept his new position until 1966. Throughout all these years in the driving seat of the economy, Erhard could mould the economy based on the model of the social market economy, based on the ordoliberals, or so they say...<sup>68</sup>

III Germany

Primarily based on published secondary literature, the previous chapter explained what ordoliberalism is, what its backgrounds are and how its economic ideas were implemented into concrete policy measures. An open question in this literature, however, is an account of how exactly the ordoliberal ideology found its way into these policy measures. More in particular, the literature neglects the key role scientific bureaus of political parties have played as the mediator and actor in this transposition. This chapter aims to unveil this role, based among others on archival sources not previously studied. The analysis is restricted to the two scientific bureaus of political parties that prima facie were the most likely to (partly) support ordoliberalism. First, the scientific bureau is discussed that is affiliated with the party where Erhard established the social market economy: the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung (KAS), affiliated with the CDU (§III.1). Second, the scientific bureau is examined that is affiliated with the party that is an outspoken supporter of liberalism: the Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung (FNS)<sup>69</sup>, affiliated with the FDP (§III.2). For both foundations, a wide variety of issues are separately discussed, such as their establishment, their activities, their main characters and their publications. All these issues are viewed through the lens of ordoliberalism as described in the previous chapter.

§III.1 The Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung

§III.1.1 KAS - A brief history

In the earlier 1950s to the early 1970s, the scientific bureau was known under various names and had been looking for the right approach to achieve the goals it set itself. The focus in this section is on the actual establishment, for this tells the most about the scientific bureau, how it functioned, what its goals were and how the institute can be linked to ordoliberalism and/or its advocates.

<sup>69</sup> In 2007 the foundation changed its name to ‘Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung für die Freiheit’, and wishes to be referred to it that way. For convenience sake, this research sticks to the name under which the foundation was known during the studied timeframe: ‘Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung’ or simply ‘FNS’.

In the early years after the formation of the CDU there were discussions about creating an institute to promote the party's ideas, but there had not been any concrete proposals. In 1953 Bruno Heck, the then 'federal executive director' (Bundesgeschäftsführer)<sup>70</sup> of the CDU, used the recent successful Bundestag elections to try to get things moving. When lobbying important party figures, he argued that the party needed such an institute to also achieve future election victories, as it would prepare it for the dawning societal changes. In addition, a second reason for the founding of such an institute played an important role in the background. The then recently (1950) created federal party bureau (Bundesgeschäftsstelle) namely hoped an institute of political education could be a useful means of achieving the desired convergence of the several CDU state organisations, which had a wide range of traditions and profiles. At the same time the CDU state organisations feared a far-reaching centralisation of the originally federal party and hence provided some opposition to Heck's ideas. Konrad Adenauer was also rather reserved, as he feared the creation of new power centres within its party. Moreover, foundations and organisations of the old Zentrumspartei pushed Adenauer not to erect such a new institute, because they found that they already filled this role more than sufficiently. Contrary to the catholics, the evangelical wing of the CDU did not have any institutions that fulfilled the role of political education. That meant that its leaders, Hermann Ehlers and Robert Tillmanns, were easily convinced. With their backing, Heck only needed to convince Adenauer, which he managed in the end. This was not the end of internal party politics though. In the first years, especially the catholics repeatedly stipulated provisions and conditions which the foundation needed to fulfill in order to keep their support. One of the solutions for easing the resulting tensions was appointing catholics in some important party positions, including in the soon to be erected institute for political education.<sup>71</sup>

With the party backing the idea of political education, it was clear from the outset that all necessary material and organisational conditions were lacking. Other than the absence of a dedicated group of persons working efficiently on the project, the CDU did not own a space that could host conferences and the like. All activities had to be hosted <sup>70</sup> This position back then was similar to the contemporary general secretary (Generalsekretäre), a position which was only created by the CDU in 1967. Coincidentally the first Generalsekretäre was also Bruno Heck.

provisionally in an inn which was too remote for most party members' likings as well. Soon the call for the acquirement of a large building in the direct neighbourhood of Bonn, to be used for the exclusive use of the political education, became loud. These developments culminated in a meeting with all the prominent party members on 20 December 1955, on the invitation of Heinrich Krone, the leader of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group. At this meeting the attendants signed two documents. The first document agreed on the acquisition of Schloss Eichholz, a large manor that would serve as the location for the party's political eduction. It is interesting to note that one of the reasons for choosing this manor is its location, which is exactly between the political centre of Bonn and the big academical centre of Köln. The party leaders hoped that Schloss Eichholz would so serve as a practical and attractive intermediary for exchanges between academia and politics. The second document founded the first precursor of the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung: die Gesellschaft für christlich-demokratische Bildungsarbeit (the Society for Christian Democratic Education Work).<sup>72</sup>

After most of the reconstruction works in the manor had been finished about one year later, the manor could start being used in December 1956, even before the official opening a few months later in April 1957. Typical of the then relation between the CDU and the newly created institute is the fact that at the opening merely party members were present. In contrast, in the early twenty-first century these high-profile occasions would always be attended by representatives of other scientific bureaus of political parties, plus both federal and state officials, regardless of political colour.<sup>73</sup>

The first leaders of the Gesellschaft were three prominent figures of the CDU, that have remained closely related to the educational centre throughout many years. First there is the aforementioned federal executive director of the CDU, Bruno Heck, who became the very first chairman of the centre. Second, Konrad Kraske, who was Heck's deputy at the federal party bureau and who was also appointed as Heck's deputy for the Gesellschaft. The third leader was the also aforementioned Heinrich Krone, the leader of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group, who was appointed as secretary. While the connection between the CDU and the newly created educational centre are already very apparent, it is even more so if one takes into account that these three gentlemen simply combined their new positions with their previous ones. Indeed, they actually considered their activities at the Gesellschaft as being part of the responsibilities of their main positions. The close, intertwining links between the Gesellschaft and the CDU were not viewed as problematic, but as necessary, logical and obvious. These intertwining links were still possible at the time, because the Bundesverfassungsgericht<sup>74</sup> had not yet narrowed the possibilities of party funding. One can also see this in the fact that in the earlier years of the political educational centre its activities have been put on the balance sheet of the federal party bureau of the CDU.<sup>75</sup>

About a year later in April 1958, the Gesellschaft changed its name to Politische Akademie Eichholz, predominantly in light of a recent judgment of the Bundesverfassungsgericht about party financing. The name change came accompanied with several changes in the highest echelons of the educational centre. Arnold Bergstraesser became the first chairman, with Kraske working as second chairman next to him. Bergstraesser, who had studied economics among other subjects, represented the Akademie externally. As a professor of scientific politics and sociology he had to give the educational centre a more scientific face. Interestingly he held his seat in Freiburg where he set up the influential Freiburg School of Political Sciences. Interestingly enough, it is hard to find any personal or ideological links with the Freiburg School of Economics, other than the obvious geographical links. The most plausible explanation would be that he only returned to Germany in 1954 after fleeing the country in 1935. Kraske, as second chairman, was mainly responsible for organisational and financial matters. He was actually also mainly responsible for Bergstraesser's appointment, as Kraske convinced the CDU party leaders that an influential scientist as first chairman would both raise the Akademie's status and provide some more independence for the institute, which Kraske attached more value to than Bruno Heck. About Kraske himself it is interesting to note that he too can be linked to Freiburg, as he studied and later obtained his doctorate there. It is a lot easier to link him to ordoliberal ideas than Bergstraesser. Although his promotor for his doctorate in philosophy was not a member of the Freiburg School of Economics, Kraske himself names Eucken as one of the personalities that formed his way of thinking.

In addition, he names Adenauer and Erhard as his two idols, whom he both nearly blindly followed, intellectually.<sup>76</sup>

Only two months after the appointment of Bergstraesser and the promotion of Kraske, a third person was given a leading role in the academy. Rüdiger Altmann, who was appointed both executive director (Geschäftsführer) and leader (Leiter) of the academy, was a big supporter of using the Akademie as a sort of drilling centre for CDU members. Under Altmann courses were prioritised that would teach the participants how to most effectively combat political opponents. Fundamental questions about political education were avoided. What the Akademie offered was also called 'parteipolitische Schulungsarbeit', or 'party politics schooling work', thereby immediately indicating the nature of these courses. This practice could count on more and more criticism from within the party ranks, which condemned it as resembling the socialist party drilling and they also deemed the practice incompatible with the several layers of the CDU.<sup>77</sup>

To turn the tide, the CDU elected a new leader instead of Altmann in 1960: Peter Molt. Molt, who would keep his position until 1966, earned his doctorate degree under Alexander Rüstow. When asked what he as a christian-democrat considered to be the christian components<sup>78</sup> of his beliefs, he named 'political freedom, defence against totalitarianism and the social market economy' as three of his five points. Molt also endorsed the idea that many simply followed Adenauer when it came to translating christian ideals into concrete policies. Perhaps redundant, but as Adenauer left the lion's share of the social market economy policies for Erhard to decide, Molt's ideas basically corresponded with most ordoliberal ideas.<sup>79</sup>

It was Molt's task to lead the change of direction of the Akademie from the CDU party drilling institute it was to a proper centre of political education. The renewed centre would have to stay faithful to christian-democratic principles, and at the same time expand the research frontier of the historic and social sciences. Molt worked together with

Heck, Kraske, Bergstraesser and Molt's deputy Bernhard Gebauer to achieve this. Their philosophy was that the Akademie could only be successful if it would offer a programme that would appeal to the interests of their target groups. They thought the Akademie should not behave like a religious institute, which preaches what is right and wrong and is often aimed at a select group of people. Besides, finding common ground with all the different groups within the CDU would prove rather difficult, they thought. Therefore, the Akademie replaced the old programme step by step by one which they considered to be educating citizens in a very broad sense. Ultimately only a four-day drilling course remained, which only targeted local CDU leaders. Molt also viewed this from the positive side, as he thought then at least also all local party leaders would know to find their way to Schloss Eichholz.<sup>80</sup>

The period under Molt from was a time of searching and experimenting, which finally resulted in a flexible, future proof institute that could easily adapt to the changing circumstances of the time. In both size and status the Akademie kept on growing, both nationally and internationally. However, due to the unrest accompanied with the succession of Konrad Adenauer, he withdrew himself from the institute in 1966.<sup>81</sup>

Konrad Adenauer withdrew himself as federal chancellor in 1963, when he was already 87 years old. A few years later, in 1966, he also stepped down as CDU chairman. Due to his high age both acts were only a matter of time. In the meantime, he did not tutor a successor. These circumstances lead to uncertainty and unrest in and around the CDU, including the Akademie and later the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung. The opportunities that the educational centre had to offer were decreasingly made use of and CDU members increasingly underestimated the centre's value. Something had to be changed. With chairman Bergstraesser's death in 1964 the federal office of the CDU saw the time ripe for several changes. Although many employees of the Akademie preferred another academic to chair its centre, the CDU chose to elect a double chair with strong party ties. The new 'Doppelspitze' consisted the recently stepped down state secretaries Franz Thedieck (Ministry of All-German Affairs, or Bundesministerium für Gesamtdeutsche Fragen) and Alfred Müller-Armack (Ministry of Economic Affairs), although the latter is better known for being one of the ordoliberal champions. These appointments coincided with the name change of the Politische Akademie Eichholz to the 'Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung für politische Bildung und Studienförderung', which was shortened in 1976 to simply 'Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung'. As this name shortening was not coupled with any other changes, for convenience sake the latter name is used to also refer to the centre in between 1964 and 1976. Other than the appointment of two men of great status and with a clear political CDU profile, the 1964 name change was also coupled with other organisational changes. The Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung (KAS) was erected as its own legal entity, and within its structure several departments were created. Although personal links always ensured the KAS remained closely affiliated with the CDU, this meant a certain degree of independence was guaranteed. Adenauer's name was given to the refurbished Stiftung, because there was a strong desire within the party ranks to award him with a considerable memorial while he was still alive.<sup>82</sup>

Although the change described above definitely had its effect, most especially on the organisation and independence of the Stiftung, there was a great amount of continuity in the path the KAS took with respect to contents. In the first two years after the name change Molt was still the leader of the academy, and when his deputy Bernhard Gebauer took over in 1966, he carried on Molt's work until the beginning of the eighties. The KAS kept on expanding and expanding both in size and scope, which is further elaborated below. Most important is to mention here that the focus of the Stiftung remained on further expanding and interlinking a network in which politicians, scientists, journalists and other opinion makers could exchange their experiences and ideas.<sup>83</sup>

The last significant event in the postwar history of the KAS is the moment when the scientific bureau was put back under the chair of one man. In 1968 Bruno Heck, the very first chairman of the then Gesellschaft, took up his old post and would remain there until 1989. Heck, still of the opinion the bureau's future should be in the hands of the general secretary of the CDU, was trusted by the party leaders with the task of directing the KAS with all the new responsibilities it received and activities it pursued over time. Manfred Wörner, who would later become secretary general of the NATO, was appointed as executive director. Other members on the executive board include Konrad Kraske, just as Heck one of the leading characters of the first hour.<sup>84</sup>

SIII.1.2 Target groups, themes & institutional growth

The previous section explained that the forerunners of het KAS gradually changed from an educational centre that should mould and drill CDU members' ideas into that of the official party line, to an institute that wanted to educate citizens according to christian-democratic principles in a more general sense, alongside expanding the research frontier. But who exactly did the KAS and its forerunners target? Ever since the creation of the Gesellschaft the question has been whom to invite to the educational centre, because there were only limited means. Although the programme has undergone some radical shifts in the earlier years, those working at Schloss Eichholz had always considered their role to be to educate citizens to better fulfil their function as active citizens in the Federal Republic. The relevant citizens that were targeted, can be divided into three easily distinguishable groups. The first group consisted of public officials, public servants and employees of all the several partyrelated organisations. The second group consisted of those that were seen as responsible for shaping the public opinion, such as journalists, teachers and the clergy. The third group consisted of politically interested young men and women, and especially those that showed interest in learning about democratic values. Each of these groups were approached with different educational formats, so as to better fit the target group. They all had their own seminars, courses and so forth. Interestingly the Stiftung pursued this policy of targeting the elite all the way from the creation of the Gesellschaft up to the early eighties, when the masses were targeted as well.<sup>85</sup>

To give an impression of who the people were that were attracted to the KAS, there are several facts about the average visitors in the sixties. About 60% of the participants were members of the CDU, CDU or one of its subsidiary organisations. The amount of female participants was relatively low back then, with only 12%. The predominant age group were young people of 18 to 35 years old. Other than teachers that were on the payroll of the KAS itself, with approximately 180 there were many visiting teachers or panel members that occasionally or regularly provided the institute with their input. In

1970 only the Politische Akademie Eichholz (PAE) pillar of the KAS, the most relevant for this research, organised 112 multi day conferences, seminars and courses, which totalled 3220 participants. 52 one day conferences were good for 490 participants. These were only the numbers for the location Schloss Eichholz. On top of that the PAE organised 85 seminars and conferences throughout the country that attracted 2234 participants in total. Last but not least, 313 local events were organised in the Bundesland Nordrhein-Westfalen that covered fundamental and then topical problems of the German democratic order, with 10063(!) participants. When one compares these numbers with those in earlier years, one can clearly see a trend of continuous rapid growth. In 1960 the PAE had 'only' 2025 total participants, which already had been more than doubled in 1964 to 4236. Of the grand total of all events in the end of the sixties yearly an average of 20 congresses and conferences were organised at Schloss Eichholz that were specifically intended for students from Western Europe, which indeed included the Netherlands.<sup>86</sup>

The central role the KAS saw role for itself in educating active citizens for society has been discussed. Unlike many other confessional organisations, however, it was not strict and parochial. It chose actual topics and themes that were interesting for its target groups and treated these in a way that transcended typical group identity lines in society. By not sticking to a certain confession or social class, the Stiftung and the CDU wanted to be a real people's party. Looking back at its own history, the Stiftung noted that the topical themes in the early days definitely included some core political issues, such as the loss of lands and the split between East and West, the social market economy, international politics and development politics, the redesign of Europe, the functioning of political parties in Germany, antisemitism, and the fight against totalitarian ideologies. These themes indeed do not seem like very parochial issues. In general one can definitely say that within these core themes the KAS followed the politics and ideas as revealed by its namegiver, even long after his death.<sup>87</sup>

Because of its popularity, the Stiftung kept on expanding and expanding, both in size and in scope, with regards to both the Stiftung's activities and its physical buildings at Schloss Eichholz. Most of these expansions started within the Politische Akademie Eichholz, which includes the time when it operated as one of the pillars of the Konrad-

Adenauer-Stiftung. Once certain programmes or topics grew big enough to work better with more autonomy, new institutes within the KAS were created. The institutes that were created before the seventies, are briefly be discussed. This also goes for the two most central seminars that have not been institutionalised.<sup>88</sup>

Perhaps the most consequential expansion of the KAS has been the foundation of the 'Institut für Internationale Solidarität' in 1962. Back then there were two reasons for the foundation of this institute. On the one hand Germany wanted to make the world a better place by providing the necessary developing aid. Both the federal government and the CDU/CSU parliamentary group were afraid of burning their fingers and therefore advocated a rather reserved approach. Because institutes like the KAS were considered excellent intermediaries, this finally resulted in the government wanting to fund all their development aid through them. On the other hand, christian-democratic movements had been trying to support the christian-democratic parties and the democratisation process in general in several foreign countries, most in particular those in Latin America. Therefore the KAS itself was very keen to put up the effort that the federal government desired. Throughout the years the Institut für Internationale Solidarität grew and grew, with already 62 full-time employeeed that were deployed in 22 countries in 1970. Currently the KAS has about 100 foreign offices that supports activities in over 120 countries worldwide. Although the scientific bureau of the CDU sometimes has some projects in the Netherlands, none of the foreign offices is located there. The Dutch projects are lead from the office in Brussels, which was opened in 1978 and therefore after the researched time slot.<sup>89</sup>

In 1965 the KAS erected the 'Institut für Begabtenförderung'. This is an institute that grants scholarships to all sorts of students, both in Germany and abroad. Although this already may sound impressive, the yearly grants totalled 'only' slightly more than 300 in 1970. The lucky ones received in between 500 and 600 DM a month though. It is good to know of the existence of this institute, but further details are not required for this research.<sup>90</sup>

Another institute of the KAS that does not require many details, is the 'Institut für kommunalpolitische Bildung und Forschung', which was quickly renamed to 'Institut für Kommunalwissenschaften'. This institute focused on educating politicians that were solely active at decentralised political entities, such as municipalities. It was institutionalised out of the highly popular 'Kommunalpolitische Seminar'; its increased autonomy gave it the room for further expansions.<sup>91</sup>

A more interesting part of the KAS is the 'Institut für Sozialwissenschaftliche Forschung'. Its history tells a lot about one of the roles the KAS played in translating science to politics. Soon after the inception of the Gesellschaft, Schloss Eichholz became a popular place for both scientists and politicians to get in touch with 'the other side'. Within this framework, the KAS decided to create a study centre at the Schloss, where important political issues could be researched with scientific methods, and which results could then be translated into everyday measures and politics. Because of the success of the study centre, it was institutionalised in 1967 under the name of 'Wissenschaftlichen Instituts der Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung', which was soon renamed to 'Institut für Sozialwissenschaftliche Forschung'. The new institute had the expanded task to use empirical methods, political sciences, documentation and statistics to acquire new fundamental knowledge nationally and internationally. The new knowledge could then be used for making policy, politics and improving the Stiftung's education.<sup>92</sup>

Throughout the years, the KAS has also created several big seminars that have not resulted in a separate institution within the KAS, but were nevertheless successful. Two of these were created in the postwar period and both have survived up to this day. The first coherent seminar was the Politische Seminar, that was developed by Peter Molt, Bernhard Gebauer and others between 1962 and 1964. The seminar consisted of 4 blocks that together totalled 7 weeks, and covered both fundamental democratic issues and changing topical political questions. Examples of those fundamental issues are the functioning of political parties, the freedom of speech, and the ever-returning fight against totalitarianism from the left and right. Topical political questions always tried to include the full range of politics, from economic and social questions to international development. The second seminar, the Wirtschaftspolitische Seminar<sup>93</sup>, was developed in 1967, unsurprisingly under the leadership of Alfred Müller-Armack indeed. This seminar was also chopped into 4 pieces that together totalled 7 weeks. According to the information of the KAS it covered issues such as 'How does a market economy function?', 'The cycle of the economy' and 'The social aspects of the market economy'. Especially the first and the last example sound similar to both the main issues covered by the ordoliberalists and the two stage implementation process of the social market economy, lead by Ludwig Erhard. Both seminars had been receiving over 100 attendants a year, and many spinoff programs were developed to target specific groups who only had a limited amount of spare time available.<sup>94</sup>

The continuing rapid growth of the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung and its predecessors have not only been due to the increasing popularity. It also works the other way around. Increasing public funds also greatly expanded the possibilities of the scientific bureau. Around the time of the creation of the Gesellschaft and the buying of Schloss Eichholz, the CDU had not yet been thriving financially. The CDU, a young party with barely any capital means, could not simply replicate what their political rivals of the SPD did. The social democratic party was significantly older and had more than sufficient capital means to simply re-establish their 'Friedrich-Ebert-Stiftung' in 1954, after their original scientific bureau (1925) had previously been shut down by the nazi regime. To erect a scientific bureau that was roughly modelled after the SPD's example, the CDU needed external funding. The 'Bundesverband der Deutschen Industrie' (BDI) provided this funding from the very beginning. Together with the CDU it created the 'Staatsbürgerlichen Vereinigung' in 1954, an organisation which was used to funnel money to the CDU without paying taxes, as it was labelled an organisation for public benefit. Within the party there was quite some resistance against this construction, which was eventually overcome. Especially the committee for social democratic employees feared the CDU would bend for the interests of the industrialists. According to the KAS, there had never been any strings attached to this funding by the industrial lobby though. The BDI mostly wanted to improve the CDU members' understanding of the social market, plus improve the organisational structures of the party and thereby increase the stability in the country. The BDI thought a scientific bureau would be an excellent fit for these purposes.<sup>95</sup>

From the beginning the BDI made clear that their funding was only intended to cover the starting period of the scientific bureau and that the CDU had to look for alternative means to continue their work in later years. After the industrial lobbyists finally made clear that were about to stop their funding, the increased CDU's searching effort resulted in 1960 in funding by the state of Nordrhein-Westfalen and by its public broadcaster Westdeutscher Rundfunk, better known as WDR. In 1962 also the federal government got involved. The scientific bureau, considered to be an organisation for public benefit, started to receive increasing sums of money from the Bundesministerium für wirtschaftliche Zusammenarbeit and subsequently also the Bundesministerium des Innern. The former ministry was only created a year earlier and funded all its foreign development activities through scientific bureaus like the KAS. The second ministry used the scientific bureaus in a similar way and wanted them to grant scholarships. Back then all federal funding was coordinated together with the aforementioned Friedrich-Ebert-Stiftung. All the public funding did not only increase the possibilities for political education, but it also gave rise to the creation of all the aforementioned institutes within the KAS. In addition, other expansions could be facilitated, such as a dramatic growth of its library and other supporting services.<sup>96</sup>

Of course there were many other sources of income for the KAS, such as the sales of publications, membership and subscription fees, donations and inheritances.<sup>97</sup> All these sources combined are however dwarfed by the public funds. To put things into contemporary perspective: the estimated total income of the KAS in 2016 is 163,6 million euros, out of which 161,0 million euros come from public sources. The federal government is responsible for 154,3 million euros. That is indeed an enormous amount. To give an even better picture of how big the KAS is, it currently has 1176 employees worldwide, out of which approximately half is seated in Germany. 82,3 Million euros of the total budget, so approximately half, is spent on covering the international operations.

<sup>97</sup> Some wealthier people also put their full bequest into a foundation. The foundation would then donate yearly to the KAS.

In 1964, only 2 years after the Institut für Internationale Solidarität was created, the KAS already spent 4,8 million Deutsche Mark on the only initiating international operations. Corrected for inflation this corresponds to approximately 9,5 million present-day euros. When looking at the amount of employees, these already totalled 84 in 1965. Compa In 1970, the three year old Institut für Sozialwissenschaftliche Forschung (42) together with the Institut für Internationale Solidarität (62) already offered more than 100 full-time positions. Exact numbers on the total budget in the post-war period of the KAS and its predecessors unfortunately do not exist or have been lost<sup>98,99</sup>

SIII.1.5 Publications<sup>100</sup>

The Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung has produced 17 'loose titles' in the postwar period. Some of these titles were actually a series that contained 3 publications or more, so the number of 17 should be higher if one counts every publication separately. The Stiftung only started publishing these loose titles in the late sixties. By then particularly the Institut für Internationale Solidarität started producing series and other loose titles. The other institutions of the KAS followed suit, but only started to become productive in the seventies. Unfortunately, the contents of the published titles in the defined postwar period are not relevant for our research. In addition to the loose titles, the KAS published six periodicals: 'Die Frau in der offenen Gesellschaft', a magazine aimed at women; 'Im Gespräch', an information bulletin aimed at students; 'Overseas Indian', a bulletin

<sup>98</sup> On the one hand, the predecessors of the KAS did not have their own budget and the CDU did not keep track of a separate budget for their scientific bureau. On the other hand, the KAS admitted they lost all annual reports before 1970, with the exception of 1964 and 1965/66. In addition, these first annual reports are a little scrappy from a finance perspective. They include many interesting facts and numbers of many activities of the KAS, but unfortunately they do not include any financial overviews or balance sheets.

informing about the foreign activities of the KAS; 'Presseinformation der Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung', the medium used for press releases. These four publications first appeared in the second half of the sixties. 'Eichholz-Brief' is the oldest periodical of the KAS. It was a message bulletin covering the activities of the Politische Akademie Eichholz. Surprisingly, the circulation of this quarterly, that was aimed at employees and participants, was up to 20000. The circulation of the scientific journal of the KAS, the 'Die Politische Meinung', had only about 5000 subscribers. One number costed 1,50DM in 1958 and 4,-DM in 1967. This corresponds to €3,32 and €7,28 in 2016. Thereby the scientific journal more than compensated for the small increase in size of an individual issue. With less than a handful of exceptions, all issues were exactly 96 pages up to 1965. After a brief period of experimenting, this was increased to 120. This development can also be derived from Table III.1.1 above. In that table, it is also visible that around that time the Meinung also made the switch from a monthly to a quarterly. This was due to a declining interest in the journal.<sup>101</sup>

Table III.1.2 The most productive authors of the Die Politische Meinung in the postwar period.

Die Politische Meinung was founded by Otto Lenz and Erich Peter Neumann. In Table III.1.2 above, the most productive authors of the scientific journal are listed. The name that sticks out, is Anton Böhm. The ordoliberal wrote its first article for the Meinung in 1957, and produced many more since. Interestingly, he barely wrote about economic topics. Instead, the great majority of his articles treated political processes. The times he did cover an economic issue, it does not come as a surprise that his ideas were ordoliberal. Müller-Armack wrote one article the Meinung, in which he pleaded for measures that lead to less inflation. Röpke is the third and last ordoliberal who published in the Meinung, with 5 articles between 1959 and 1962. Two were about foreign policy, and the other three covered different facets of ordoliberal theory. Moreover, there were 7 authors who wrote both in the ORDO and in Die Politische Meinung. Erik von Kuehnelt-Leddihn wrote 2 articles in ORDO. In the Meinung he did not write anything of real interest for our research.

The same goes for Wilhelm Grewe, with one article in both journals, and Fritz W. Meyer, with 10 in ORDO and 1 in the Meinung. Günter Schmölders wrote 5 articles in ORDO. In the Meinung he pleaded for private property. Hans Otto Wesemann wrote only once in ORDO. In the Meinung 4 of his 8 articles had economic topics, and with regards to content they were fully in line with ordoliberalism. The same goes for the only article Joseph Höffner wrote in the Meinung, which equals his publications in ORDO. Last but not least is Volkmar Muthesius, who wrote twice in ORDO. In the Meinung most of his 8 articles were about monetary subjects. He pleaded for monetary stability and against anti-cyclical policies.<sup>102</sup>

With regards to contents, Die Politische Meinung supported the ordoliberal policies throughout the whole postwar period. There were not that many articles that followed the ordoliberal rhetorics and set out an inherently consistent ideology which resembles ordoliberalism though. This is probably due to ordoliberalism stemming from the neoliberal stream. In other words, such a trail of thought was typical for (neo)liberals. The concrete policy measures and even their underpinnings, were definitely ordoliberal. The social market economy had always been supported and the same goes for monetary stability, for example. The articles in the Meinung were pro-democracy, against totalitarianism, pro European integration and western and atlantic cooperation. Of course the platform of the scientific journal was used for some deviant opinions, but that did not get any further than cautiously asking whether using anti-cyclical policies would be a good idea. It is not so surprising for a scientific institute with so many elements that link it to the CDU, that its scientific journal follows the party line.

§III.2 The Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung

The Freie Demokratische Partei (FDP) was created a few years after the Second World War in 1948. For the first time in German history a party was created that combined all the different liberal streams in the country. Classical liberals, social liberals and nationalist liberals were all unified under the umbrella of the FDP. However, they were only unified as a political stream, not in ideology. The party was set up with a federal structure, allowing all the regional departments to keep their specific identity. In the meantime, the postwar years brought about protracted processes of both denazification and amnesty, that affected FDP too, most in particular the nationalist branches of the party. Despite the internal noise, the party had been part of the government coalition since Adenauer's first chancellorcy in 1949. In 1957 the CDU/CSU grabbed the absolute majority and forced the FDP into opposition. The FDP was surprised by this event and started a period of internal reflection, that finally resulted in the party's very first political manifesto in the same year. In this the FDP considered itself a party with a conservative middle signature, positioned as a third power in between the social democrats and the conservatives. Added to the political problems were the lack of party funds, which was only exacerbated by the decreased significance of the FDP. One of the consequences was that the 'Bundesparteischule', a party institute that was created just a year earlier to mould party members into the official party line, was severely threatened in its existence. Despite strong opposition from the party treasurer, Hans Wolfgang Rubin, the party chairman acquired sponsoring from the Bundesverband der Deutschen Industrie, just like the CDU. However, the provided 50000 Deutsche Mark a month were not enough to cover all party costs. For financial reasons, the Bundesparteischule was closed.<sup>103</sup>

However, the party wanted to ensure the continued possibilities of political education in an institution. From a financial perspective, the FDP thought it would be wise to set up such an institution slightly differently. If the new institution could be earmarked as an institution for general benefit, the limited sponsors of the party would be able to give parts of their funds tax-free to that institution. Substantively, there was a big push for a new institution as well, particularly from the reform oriented wing of the FDP. This wing wanted to renew the foundations of German liberalism. By developing an interior reform programme and a new concept of liberal social policies, it thought it could win intellectuals, the new middle class and some craftsman for the party. The best way to achieve this, would be to trigger a broad discussion on these issues and the best platform for this would be a newly created institute for modern liberalism. Two exponents of these ideas, Karl-Hermann Flach and his friend Hermann Gentner, then worked out a detailed plan for an association which they called the 'Friedrich-Naumann-Gesellschaft'. The chosen name was smart in many ways, but mostly because Friedrich Naumann's backgrounds and ideas were so diverse that all different wings of the party had something to like in him. Naumann was a protestant theologian, who was both a liberal politician and a minister of a protestant church. He was a big supporter of the militarist nationalism under leadership of the German emperor. Moreover, he was sympathetic for the social cause and wanted to form a bridge between the liberals and the socialists. In addition, he had a strong belief about political education. According to him, citizens were required to be educated politically if they were to participate in the political process. And, political participation is the cornerstone of a functioning democracy. Therefore, Naumann was a big advocate of improving the political education of citizens. However, proper political education should never be along party lines, but should teach about democracy in a neutral, liberal way. It should naturally also be open for people of other denominations, and particularly to social democrats. With the exception of the mentioning of the lattermost part about social democrats, the detailed plan about the Friedrich-Naumann-Gesellschaft was basically that what Naumann himself envisaged. In addition, the detailed plan included a second pillar. As one of its core tasks, the created academic institute was to publish an academic journal called 'liberal', which is further covered below.. By means of enthusing participants of seminars and conferences, and readers of the academic journal for liberal ideas, the two pillars would also indirectly increase the potential of the FDP.<sup>104</sup>

The FDP's federal secretary general(Bundesgeschäftsführer), Werner Stephan, was one of the staunchest supporters of the plan. He took it to Theodor Heuss, the first president of the Federal Republic and a father figure for the FDP. His initial response was that he was really enthusiastic, but that he could not be on the executive board, and that it was important that the institute should be closely linked to the party. Stephan then told Heuss that actually the idea was to create an institute that was fully independent from any party, just like the Friedrich-Ebert-Stiftung. Heuss answered that that was also a good idea, because everyone then associated that scientific bureau with social democracy. As long as Stephan would create a scientific bureau that was clearly liberal and therefore ideologically linked with the FDP, Heuss would back the plan. In reality, Heuss also actively helped in shaping the institute whose namegiver was his political mentor. Mainly he co-decided the persons whom to ask for becoming a founder of the institute. Interestingly, one of the persons Heuss suggested was Alexander Rüstow, one of the ordoliberal champions. For unknown reasons, he declined the offer. The most eye-catching acceptance of the invitation was probably by Arnold Bergstraesser, who by then had been one of the two chairmen of the Politische Akademie Eichholz for over half a year. Of the 15 people who became the ultimate founders, most were either a scientist, journalist or industrialist. Only few of them were active members of the FDP. With the exception of one person, all founders were over the age of 60 and had thereby consciously lived successively in the German Empire, the Weimar Republic and the Third Reich. This bonded the founders to a large degree in their preferred distance to party politics, although not to politics itself. Only once it was settled who would found the party and when, the several departments of the FDP were notified. Ultimately the Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung (FNS) was founded on 18 May 1958, and Theodor Heuss was the first to put down his signature.<sup>105</sup>

Just like before the creation of the FNS, it was Werner Stephan who pulled the strings during the first years of its existence. During its first year he acted as executive director of the scientific bureau, until he was officially appointed into the position in April 1959. He then resigned from his position at the FDP and could fully focus on his work at the Stiftung. Because the FNS would only start operating in April 1959 as well, the first few months were dedicated to many preparatory steps. For example, the starting capital of 50000 Deutsche Mark had to be scrambled together, something which the FNS would only accomplish in 1960. Luckily finding sponsors was a little easier, because the institution was earmarked as publicly beneficial and could therefore receive tax-free gifts. Although the gifts were a little disappointing, it was enough to keep the institution running. The other preparatory steps were related to the actual work of the Stiftung, namely organising conferences and congresses, and setting up the academic journal. In November 1958 the board of governors met for the first time, and appointed Walter Erbe as the first chairman of the institute. Erbe stepped down three years later to become the vice-chairman. Paul Luchtenberg took his place and stayed there until the end of the postwar period. Werner Stephan stepped down as executive director in 1964, although he remained a member of the board of directors until 1984. Barthold C. Witte took over and also kept his position during the rest of the postwar period. The ordoliberal champions have not been in the board of directors, board of governors or in the advisory committee. Hayek was though, in the lattermost and least influential of the three, which averaged over 40 persons at a time.<sup>106</sup>

The activities and growth of the Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung show a similar pattern to that of the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung. The first years the yearly budget was in between 120000,- and 300000,- Deutsche Mark, and the scientific bureau focused on seminars and conferences. During these years, the FNS apparently mostly competed for the same sources of funding as the FDP. The scientific bureau mostly scrambled its budget together from federal funds, the public broadcaster WDR, decentralised public funding and some private sources. In 1962 things changed, because the federal government started to fully delegate development aid to scientific bureaus of political parties, including the FNS. The federal ministry of the interior also started subsidising political education in the country. The increased funding allowed for a great expansion in both scale and scope of the activities of the scientific bureau. New branches were opened in Asia, Africa and particularly South-America. Also within Germany the Stiftung started to expand, although the latter only really started in 1969, when 6 regional offices had been opened. In 1970 the total number of regional offices<sup>107</sup> in Germany was already 16. In the first three years 19 seminars in total were organised by the FNS, which was expanded to approximately a dozen a year. The number of conferences and other gatherings, was gradually increased as well, but did not exceed the number of seminars. The regional expansion greatly increased the conference number. In 1970 already 200 of such activities were organised by the local departments. Thereby the number of attendees was also multiplied greatly, with over 6000 regional visitors in 1970. The ‘central’ location of the FNS started with 500 in 1960, grew to 1200 in 1962 and did not expand much beyond that. It is important to note that the ‘central’ location of the FNS changed from meeting to meeting, because the Stiftung only owned a location suited for political education in 1967, when the construction of the Theodor-Heuss-Akademie in Gummersbach had finished. Perhaps the moving nature of the activities of the FNS gave rise to what the institute considered the only real difference in activities, compared to other scientific bureaus of political parties. Namely, seminars of the FNS regularly included field trips. The destinations were often located abroad, such as the NATO or the European institutions in Brussels or Strasbourg. Dutch destinations have not been identified. Finally, in addition to the construction of its own academy and the foreign and regional expansion, the FNS started a scholarship programme (1967), expanded its archive and increased its publications. In numbers, the budget increased from nearly 300000,- DM in 1962 to more than tenfold in 1966, nearly 7 million DM in 1969 and over 10 million DM in 1970. Employeewise, in 1960 only 5 people worked for the Stiftung, including one part-time. The number of full-time employees grew to 20 in 1964 and 148 in 1970, including those working abroad. In comparison, the budget in 2008 was €38 million with a staff off 88, excluding supporting employees. More than 95% of the budget comes from public funding.<sup>108</sup>

The opening of the Theodor-Heuss-Akademie allowed for the reception of a greater number of guests, on a more frequent basis. The academy included hotel facilities and the Stiftung started organising more (international) conferences. Even guests from other continents were flown to Germany, in particular students that showed great potential in the foreign programmes of the FNS. Among the Europeans, Dutch people were not excluded. The most interesting visit is one by Edzo Toxopeus, who was the political leader of the VVD from 1963 to 1969. Furthermore, he was the leader of Liberal International, the international federation of liberal political parties. In his second capacity he had been in touch with the FNS more often, although it is hard to say what effects this relation had. Albert Hunold of the Mont Pèlerin Society had been in touch with the FNS as well, although there is no evidence that he actually visited the Stiftung or that their contact had been anything more than an invitation to strengthen their ties. Domestically, the Stiftung identified several target groups for their activities. It thought the regional branches of the FDP, youth and student organisations, students of tertiary education, occupational organisations, and evangelic organisations would be nice sources of potentially interested persons. It was in doubt whether to canvass at the military as well. It turned out that especially young academics were interested in the work of the Stiftung, although female students were relatively hard to convince. As a result, before the opening of the Theodor-Heuss-Akademie, most activities were organised in universities (of applied science). The remaining activities were most often organised in hotels or evangelic academies. Surprisingly, the FNS struggled to convince FDP members to join the events of the FNS. Moreover, the highly esteemed groups of entrepreneurs and people with a free profession, appeared to be reluctant too.<sup>109</sup>

The very first conference of the Stiftung had a special set-up. By inviting practically only journalists, the bureau hoped to quickly spread the word about its existence. The three-day conference had four main speakers, including Alexander Rüstow. In the first half year there were 13 activities, of which 4 had clearly liberal themes, such as 'liberalism yesterday and today'. The other 9 had a general theme, and none of those were economic. Of its activities, the FNS particularly documented its seminars well. In most years, one of its dozen seminars was specifically about the economy, but its contents are unknown. The other seminars often had a quite general theme. It is interesting to note that the themes were not approached from a 'harsh, businesslike' approach, but were more societally oriented. For example, the theme 'state and society' included topics such as 'church', 'school', 'family' and 'the company'. The only obviously liberal topic in this theme was 'freedom in the mass society'. In 1961 Rüstow was one of the main speakers at a conference again, this time with the time ‘the family in our time’. There Rüstow pleaded against child benefits, as it would remove the responsibility of families. The other participants disagreed with Rüstow. In 1970 the FNS notes that most social-economic topics had been neglected for a while. Topics that did regularly pass in review were ‘co-determination’ and ‘the humane company’. In 1970 the long neglected topics of ‘business concentration and competition’ and ‘scientific and technical cooperation with socialist countries’ were put back on the agenda. Especially the first three sound like topics the ordoliberalists occupied themselves with.<sup>110</sup>

In 1967 a stirring period in the Stiftung’s existence started, which lasted for approximately three years. Since the ‘Grand Coalition’ of the CDU/CSU and the SPD took power in December 1966, rumours started to spread that rules concerning party financing would drastically change. New legislation was in the pipeline that would give political parties the power to decide where large parts of the federal funding of scientific bureaus would go to. This put the FDP in a position of power. It expected that it could decide how the money would be used. The FNS wanted to remain fully independent though, but it needed the funding. The position of the FNS was even made weaker, because some FDP members decided to found a new institute in 1967, the ‘Wolfgang Döring Stiftung’ (WDS). Without any notice, the WDR withdrew its funding for the FNS and funded the WDS instead, thereby further weakening the position of the FNS. The FDP was at a crossroads as well. The WDS offered an alternative that was very outspoken in its support for the FDP, although it cannot really be called a scientific institute. Instead, it focused on more accessible propaganda, and until then only on the land Nordrhein-Westfalen. In the years prior to the establishment of the Wolfgang Döring Stiftung, Erich Mende, the leader of the FDP from 1960 to 1968, was toying with the idea to set up a competing scientific institute too. The ‘Max-Becker-Stiftung’ would never come to be, but it is telling that the party leader was that displeased with the position and working of the FNS. It must be clear that the situation of the Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung was precarious. Step by step it gave in to the pressure from the FDP. More and more party members were given positions in the scientific bureau, and also the party archive had to be acquired by the FNS. In addition, the institute even had to fulfil a new role in moulding the FDP party members. The first decade of the Stiftung is known as one of unparalleled independence. The period that followed, brought the period of its greatest dependence. Outside the scope of this research is the current era, in which the FDP and the FNS have found a middle way.<sup>111</sup>

SIII.2.1 liberal<sup>112</sup>

The 'liberal' has been the main publication of the Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung since its first issue in 1958. As mentioned above, it was considered one of the pillars of the plan to create a scientific bureau. Liberal was to serve as a scientific forum for dynamic discussions and it should ensure public effectiveness of the liberal message. It should spearhead the political debate and help clear up the social deficit in liberal circles. Other than liberal, the FNS had issued several other periodicals as well. Because these are titles that serve as an internal announcing messenger, for example, these are not covered in our research. The focus is on the scientific periodical, which is the liberal. The Stiftung published a decent number of irregular works as well, which were often part of a series. Only two of these works were written within the theme of economics. The first can be translated as 'Planning in the market economy'<sup>113</sup>, the second one as 'Currency between politics and economics'<sup>114</sup>. Both are literal transcriptions of presentations and discussions at conferences that were about the topics that its titles suggest. The discussions fit perfectly into the narrative of the publications of the liberal, and are therefore discussed below.<sup>115</sup>

As can be seen in Table III.2.1, the first years of the liberal were quite irregular, with many extra numbers issued. The trend is clear though, with a continuous growth in numbers, articles and pages until halfway the sixties. In the last years of the postwar period the issuance of the scientific journal stabilised. It is unclear how many subscribers it had. What is known, is that the FDP started sponsoring 3000 to 4000 subscriptions a year in 1967, as part of a deal between the FDP and the FNS that was made during the described power struggle. The sponsored subscriptions were mostly aimed at students and military officers, who did not have to pay any fee (anymore). In 1963 the normal fee for the then quarterly was 1,50DM per number or 5,-DM per year, of which the latter equals approximately €10,- a year.<sup>116</sup>

Throughout het years the names of the different sections in the liberal changed, but the contents stayed the same. The most important were the scientific articles, which is discussed below. Other frequently recurring sections covered portraits, liberal documentation and event reportings, book reviews, readers' letters, discussions, and commentaries on all sorts of 'things', from political events to highlighted opinions in specific articles of newspapers and magazines. None of the two dozen portraits described the life of one of the ordoliberalists. The liberal documentation section could be the summarised publication of a FDP document, the coverage of an international conference for young liberals, or the correspondence between certain liberal agents. Just like the readers' letters, this section did not contain any relevant information for our research. The number of book reviews declined from approximately equal to the number of scientific articles, to about a third of the latter. The great majority of the reviewed authors were either German or German-speaking. Röpke received a positive review in the first year of the liberal, and Rüstow was favoured positively in 1964. The authors of the limited foreign books ranged from Samuel Huntington to Mao Zedong, but none of them were economists or covered an economic topic.

Table III.2.2 The most productive authors of the liberal in the postwar period.

Table III.2.2 above lists the most productive authors of the liberal in the postwar period. Only articles have been taken into account. Looking at the table, Rolf Schroers immediately sticks out. Most of his articles were not long and scientific, but rather opinion forming columns about a topical subject. In the seventies he was the head of the Theodor-Heuss-Akademie. Manfred Rexin is interesting to mention, because when he started writing for liberal, he was a member of the youth organisation of the socialist SPD. He has had a long career as a journalist, including for the national public broadcaster ZDF. He has also remained active for the local SPD department in Berlin. Karl-Hermann Flach was one of authors of the first hour, and actually wrote the very first article in 1958. Flach had an interesting career, in which his occupation as a journalist and as a liberal politician took turns. He also wrote the political manifesto that the FPD used from 1971 to 1977, the Freiburger Thesen. In the manifesto he promoted a state based on law, freedom, tolerance, and human dignity. He wanted an alternative for absolutism, socialism and christian democracy. This fitted exactly in the spirit of his works for the liberal. Flach also had a position in the board of governors of the Stiftung for more than a decade, and before his untimely death he was briefly the vice-chair of the federal parliamentary fraction of the FDP. Hans Wolfgang Rubin was also one of the founders of liberal. Actually he was also one of the founders of the FDP, and was a member of the first hour of the FNS as well. From 1951 to 1980 he was the treasurer of the FDP, and after having continuously had positions on several boards of the FNS, he became its chairman from 1970 to 1982. Even though he originated from the industry, in those circles they viewed him as being close to the SPD. Furthermore, Flach and Rubin were the two persons closest to Werner Stephan, and were thereby among the most influential persons in the Stiftung. Peter Menke-Glückert had been on the board of directors for nearly 20 years. At the same time, he made a career in the federal Ministry of the Interior and became a director-general. Ernest Jouhy, whose actual name was Ernst Leopold Jablonski, used to be a member of the communist political party KPD and several socialist organisations. As a jew, he fled Germany when the nazi's came to power. He became a professor of social pedagogy and wrote mostly about cultural subjects. Barthold C. Witte used to be the general secretary of the International Federation of Liberal Youth. From 1961 to 1994 he held several positions in the boards of the FNS, from 1964 to 1970 he was even the executive director. Most of his writings were about development aid. After his work as an executive, his career brought him to the post of director of the cultural department of the Federal Foreign Office (Auswärtiges Amt). He was also a member of the council of the Evangelic Church in Germany (EKD). Hildegard Hamm-Brücher was a member of the board of governors from 1958 to 1993. She became a state secretary of several departments in several lands, and also held the post of state secretary of foreign affairs for a few years. Her main concern was education though. Klaus Scholder studied Germanistics and Theologie, before he wrote for the liberal. For a few years he held the position of vice-chairman of the board of governors. He became a professor of history of christianity, and devoted his life to work for the evangelic church, including pastoral duties. It is interesting note the wide variety in backgrounds of these authors. Moreover, quite a few are not evidently liberal. It may give a somewhat distorted view though, because among the less productive writers there was a fair amount of prominent FDP politicians. Not only did no ordoliberal champion write in the liberal, but actually none of the nearly 140 authors who wrote in ORDO did so.<sup>118</sup>

This could raise the expectation that liberal did not embrace ordoliberal thought. However, the opposite is true. During the whole postwar period the articles in liberal were clearly ordoliberal. Particularly before the late sixties started, many articles were published that showcased an extensive view on what the author thought liberalism was, or how a state should be ordered. The special edition in 1961 includes a prime example of this. The introduction immediately refers to Röpke. It notes an increasing resonance of the opinion that the growing power of the state is dangerous. But how dangerous is this? The author argues a growing state is inevitable. It takes up more tasks and sometimes has to interfere with personal matters. The period of coexistence with the socialist neighbours and the explosion of population growth only further induce a growing state. Such a growing state can only be liberal, because it is convinced of the need of the rule of law and looks at the needs of all individual citizens. Liberal states, in contrast with the 19th century, have to be strong states that act against power concentrations and lobby groups.

The question is not whether to plan. The mantra, that was repeated in many articles, is ‘as much freedom as possible, as much planning as necessary’. The economy of a liberal state can only be a market economy, because that would form the appropriate counterweight for state power. Tasks for the government would be to break concentrations of market power, and to ensure monetary stability. His whole argument is backed by Röpke, Böhm and Erhard, or so the author claims. As an addition to this narrative, the author warns for focusing too much on the ethical justification of the laws of supply and demand. Moreover, he warns for a new form of slavery, where large parts of society continuously have to work only to redeem their debts.<sup>119</sup>

An even better example of the kind of liberalism the liberal expressed, is the special edition from 1964. This edition was called ‘Verantwortung für die Freiheit. Beiträge zum modernen Liberalismus’ (‘Responsibility for freedom. Contributions to modern liberalism’), and included three comprehensive views on what liberalism is and where it should be headed. Although the emphasis was somewhat different, their views on modern liberalism was very alike. All three praised the wonderful achievements of liberalism in the postwar period. It brought about the change from absolutism to the rule of law, from an oppressed society to a free society and from a fruitless economy to the Wirtschaftswunder of the social market economy. The odes to the social market economy describes its ideas in all its facets, from a market economy leading to the most social outcomes, to the necessity of ensuring competition by fighting cartels, oligopolies and monopolies. The articles all refer to ordoliberalists like Eucken, Rüstow and Röpke, and they all distance themselves from ‘manchesterism’, or 19th century liberal policies. All also point to the importance of monetary stability. As a core of liberalism, they all see freedom. But freedom can only be ensured by responsibility. Responsibility not only for yourself, but also for the family and society. Responsibility means taking action, continuously. Diametrically opposed to the free, liberal society are the societies based on socialism or christian democracy. The latter two want their people to be ordained according to their ideology, and are therefore not free. Liberalism ordens its society by letting individuals orden themselves, based on the responsibilities they act upon. Unsurprisingly, the authors prefer the separation of church and state. Two even warn for christian conservative politics. According to them, one should not be fooled by the fact christian conservatives were proposing similar policies to that of liberals, such as a market economy. These proposals were only based on opportunism. These policies would not be seen as inherently good and thereby a goal in itself, but a means to gain as much power as possible.<sup>120</sup>

The narrative above finds its resonance throughout the liberal. Indeed, ‘we in the FDP consider ourselves neoliberals’, as one author wrote when the use of the term ‘ordoliberalism’ was still uncommon.<sup>121</sup> Topics that looked at religion popped up often too, where evangelicism and/or protestantism received the bulk of the attention. In those articles the liberal often fiercely argued against christian conservative politics. Note the use of the term ‘conservatism’ instead of ‘democracy’. Perhaps the scientific journal tried to lure devoted christians into their party that had more progressive ideas? If one considers that especially evangelicism itself was viewed rather positively, that could be the case. Several articles argued that there is no incoherence between evangelicism and liberalism, even a practicing evanglic pastor did.<sup>122</sup>

In the last years of the sixties the focus of most articles was somewhat different to that in the first decade. The focus used to be on defining what was liberal and on how to orden the state to ensure freedom, hence the title and subtitle of the scientific journal: ‘liberal. Beiträge zur Entwicklung einer freiheitlichen Ordnung’. The focus in the late sixties was more on what the policies of the FDP should be. In those articles still references to the postwar successes of liberalism abounded, such as the social market economy and its Wirtschaftswunder. Moreover, references to the ordoliberal champions were still made as well. However, the authors did not elaborate too much on a coherent liberal ideology. Some authors observed a ‘deideologification’, that could cause this shift. They argue that the booming economy removed the need for a radical socialist ideology, thereby shifting the political spectrum towards liberalism. Another explanation could be that the FDP forced the liberal to focus more on concrete policy proposals, once the political party affirmed its grip on the FNS. Furthermore, the new editor in chief, Rolf Schroers, could have tried to increase its exposure to FDP members, who tended to ignore the liberal.<sup>123</sup>

Two small observations rest here, which are both examples of the more concrete topics that dominated the end of the sixties. First, more and more international topics started to appear. The authors of the liberal had always favoured free trade, international organisations and multilateral agreements, but now they increasingly came to the fore. Second, a very extensive discussion of measures against monopolies and the abuse of power appeared in 1970. It urges the FDP to leave its inner contrarieties behind on this issue, and finally adopt the measures which the author, and many before him, proposes. One year later, the FDP would finally yield and adopt the 'Freiburger Thesen'. This political manifesto, written by the aforementioned productive Karl-Hermann Flach, furthered exactly the same measures, and closely resembled ordoliberal thought as a whole.<sup>124</sup>

IV The Netherlands

The previous chapter contained the essentials of the scientific bureaus of political parties in Germany in the postwar period, in which the focus was on facts that are essential for understanding the links to ordoliberal theory or to actually pursued policies. Similarly, in this chapter several of their Dutch contemporaries are characterised. The focus in this chapter is slightly different, for the term ‘ordoliberalism’ was not used in the Netherlands. In other words: the group of ordoliberals was a German phenomenon and Dutch policies at the time were not directly linked to their ideas. When investigating the history of ordoliberalism in the Netherlands, it therefore does not make that much sense to dive into works of Dutch economists or to investigate policies pursued in the Netherlands. It is more interesting to look at potential spillovers of ordoliberal thought from Germany into the Netherlands.

First, a brief description of the postwar circumstances in the Netherlands is provided (§IV.1), that allows for a proper embedding of the selected Dutch scientific bureaus of political parties. Selected are the scientific bureaus of the parties that correspond with the political colour of the CDU and FDP. The Dutch counterpart of the FDP is the liberal Volkspartij voor Vrijheid en Democratie (VVD), which translates to People’s Party for Freedom and Democracy. Its scientific bureau is called the ‘Teldersstichting’ (§IV.2). Finding a counterpart of the christian-democratic CDU is a little more complex, as its real counterpart, the Christen-Democratisch Appèl (CDA), meaning Christian Democratic Appeal, was only formed in 1980. The CDA had three predecessors two of which are investigated here. These are the Katholieke Volkspartij (KVP), or Catholic People’s Party, and the protestant Anti-Revolutionaire Partij (ARP), or Anti Revolutionary Party. The third constituent had a similar profile as the ARP, but was a smaller and participated in fewer government coalitions, hence the decision to narrow the research by leaving this party out.<sup>125</sup> After the VVD’s Teldersstichting, the ARP’s ‘Kuyperstichting’ (§IV.3) and the KVP’s ‘Centrum voor Staatkundige Vorming’ (§IV.4) are discussed successively.

<sup>125</sup> The party that is left out is the Christelijk-Historische Unie (CHU), or Christian Historical Union. Ideologically there were no fundamental distinctions between the ARP and the CHU. Both were parties with a reformed protestant character.

§IV.1 Post-war situation in the Netherlands

The situation in the Netherlands directly after the Second World War was economically comparable to the situation in Germany. After years of war, chaos and looting, the country was in a dire state. Deep poverty was widespread, and there was a great lack of basically everything. Politically, the biggest difference with its eastern neighbour was that sovereignty was quickly returned to the Dutch state. In other words, there were no occupational powers that pulled the strings. Although several ideas had been suggested on how to structure Dutch society anew, the country reverted to its old political and societal institutions. This meant a continuation of the pre-war ‘pillarisation’, in which protestant, catholics, socialists and arguably liberals<sup>126</sup> all had their own political parties, newspapers, broadcasting stations, schools, et cetera. It went even so far that these groups tended to only buy products at shops from their pillar, and even swimming pools often had a clear denomination. As it were, there were several parallel societies in the Netherlands, where people living in one pillar had barely any interaction with people living in the other pillars. In contrast, the pillars’ elites discussed issues regularly and often got along with each other perfectly fine. With the 3 or 4 parallel societies pushing their electorate to vote within their pillar, the outcome of the elections was pretty much set in stone. Until 1958 the core of the government consisted of the catholic KVP and the social-democratic PvdA. Even though these two together could form a majority-backed government in these years, other parties were added to broaden the consensus. These parties were either the liberal VVD and/or one or both of the reformed protestant parties, the ARP and the CHU. The marginal shifts in parliamentary representation caused a great amount of political stability and thereby also the optimal circumstances to rebuild the country with a wide consensus.<sup>127</sup>

<sup>126</sup> Arguably also a fourth pillar existed, the so-called ‘general pillar’, which was also called the ‘liberal pillar’.

<sup>127</sup> Kossmann 1986, p. 207-210, 230-282; ‘Kabinetten sinds 1945’, Rijksoverheid n.d., accessible via rijksoverheid.nl/regering/inhoud/over-de-regering/kabinetten-sinds-1945 (last accessed 12 December 2016); ‘Zetelverdeling 1946-heden’, Parlement & Politiek n.d., accessible via parlement.com/id/vh8lnhronvx6/zetelverdeling\_tweede\_kamer\_1946\_heden (last accessed 12 December 2016); ‘Verzuiling’, Parlement & Politiek n.d., accessible via parlement.com/id/vh8lnhrpxub/verzuiling (last accessed 12 december 2012).

The parties agreed that the recovery of the economy had to be pursued in harmony, which included societal organisation other than political parties. Entrepreneurial organisations and employees unions regularly discussed in the 'Stichting van de Arbeid' (Labour Foundation), where the different social-economic classes were to reach consensus on a wages proposals for the government. This lead to dirigist wage politics based on collective labour agreements. Other economic policies were dirigist too. In the immediate postwar years the government controlled prices as well, and it could give preference to certain segments of the economy if it deemed it necessary. For deciding its politics, the government also made use of other recently created institutions, such as the 'Centraal Planbureau' (Central Planning Bureau - CPB) and the 'Sociaal-Economische Raad' (Social-Economic Council – SER). The former uses economic analyses to also make economic forecasts. The latter consists of entrepreneurial representatives, trade union representatives and experts, and is (one of) the most important advising organ of the government on all kinds of social-economic topics. Its first advice in 1951 is illustrative of the direction of the Dutch government in the immediate postwar period. It said the most important government goals were: full employment, a balanced budget, a stable price level, adequate economic growth and an equitable distribution of income.<sup>128</sup>

Backed by a wide consensus, the government pursued what it called 'soberness politics'. Most people's main concern was simply staying alive, which actually had been the case since the pre-war crisis struck the country. The rhetorics of the government also aimed a substantial amount on the mentality of its citizens. It needed to be tough, and the country should work its way out of misery. Wages were kept low, and were often even the lowest within Europe. Also due to this competitive advantage, the economic growth spurred throughout the fifties. On average, the real growth of the GNP in those years was 5%. The economy industrialised and shifted its industrial focus from the production of foodstuffs, textiles, shoes and clothes to the technically more advanced chemical and metal industries. The economic recovery and expansion in the Netherlands was quick and smooth. Already in 1954 the government for the first time saw room for an increase in wages more than just to compensate for the increases in prices. Industrialisation continued and the government found ways to expand a social safety for its welfare state.<sup>129</sup>

The Netherlands also had monetary problems after the Second World War that had to be tackled. There was too much money in circulation, which needed to be reduced. On the other hand, the Dutch reserves were so low that extra money had to be created. A capital levy and a capital gains tax were part of the solution. Moreover, imports and exports were strictly regulated. Every ingoing or outgoing trade deal had to have the officials' approval, no matter how small. Ultimately the country fought through and had things in order, with even room for investments. The Marshall help funds were also a significant factor in improving the situation. After the economic recovery took hold in 1948, the dirigistic measurements were slowly loosened. In 1949 most distribution measures for consumption and capital goods had been abolished. Price controls were replaced by global price policies. Trade with Germany was liberalised in the same year, resulting in this trade relation nearly tripling in the relative size of all Dutch trade relations. In 1952 the overall trade balance changed into a surplus, and the excess money supply had mostly been absorbed by the same year as well.<sup>130</sup>

A principal role in managing the monetary problems was 'De Nederlandsche Bank' (DNB), the Dutch central bank. It was the authority that controlled the in- and outflow of goods and it had to oversee the monetary reforms. A complete overhaul of the DNB was planned after the Second World War. The then Minister of Finance, Piet Lieftinck, wanted the bank to purely play a technical role, executing the orders from the Ministry. However, with the new laws in 1948, the DNB kept most of its autonomy. Even though all the bank's shares came in the hands of the state and the Minister of Finance acquired a (never to be used) right to give the bank instructions in certain cases, the DNB as an institution grew in authority and a clear division between the tasks of the bank and the Ministry emerged. The bank focused on monetary matters, the Ministry on budgetary matters. Weekly lunches and consultations between the leaders of the two institutions were pivotal in harmonising the work of the institutions top-down. A great continuity and also one of the driving forces behind the growing authority of the DNB, was Marius Wilhelm Holtrop, who was its leader during nearly the whole postwar period (1946-1967). Holtrop favoured a strict monetary approach, in which price stability was the most important goal. Every year he dedicated a large section in the DNB's annual to explaining monetary issues and the policies the bank pursued. These monetary reflections even found their way abroad, where people called Holtrop's approach 'Dutch monetarism'. The approach is very comparable to the monetary approach that would subsequently become popular under influence of Friedman, but not many were to follow Holtrop's lead then. A very notable exception is Otmar Emminger, the later president of the German Bundesbank. Emminger, together with Holtrop, countered the Keynesian ideas propagated by particularly the British and the Scandinavian central banks.<sup>131</sup>

Whereas there was a lot of continuity in the monetary policies of the DNB, the policies of the Dutch government clearly changed over the years. Although it was more of a continuing trend that resulted in different situations rather than a clear trend break, one could approach the sixties as a markedly different decade than the prior postwar years. After years of economic tailwinds, the Netherlands had become a prospering nation with significantly higher standard of life. The main goal of life was not simply surviving anymore, but rather had become 'being happy', which changed the nature of both politics and policies. In the beginning of the sixties there was not much left of the dirigistic policy of keeping wages low. From the European country with one of the lowest wages, it had become one of the countries with the highest wages. International trade soared, and the Dutch profited greatly with its huge harbour in Rotterdam, for example. Social security had continuously been expanding to the point that the Netherlands was not just a 'welfare state', but it was called a 'verzorgingsstaat', which could freely be translate to a 'state that takes care'<sup>132</sup>. In addition, attempts were pursued to spread democracy in other areas than just politics, and to extend it to others than just the elite. For example, works councils and student councils were created. However, society and thereby politics became less harmonious. More and more chasms started to appear, possibly exactly because of the new abundance. What to do with all the superfluous wealth? In addition, many technological changes can explain phenomena of the changing society. TV became near-omnipresent and allowed for peaks into the other pillars, plus they made it easier to follow what the elites decided upon. Cars became affordable and made it a lot easier to travel to get in touch with other people. Even the invention of the pill brought about changes, and is considered one of the driving forces behind the sexual revolution. All in all, society was in motion. Authorities were kicked against and protest movements arose.<sup>133</sup>

Coinciding with the changing society, Dutch politics changed as well. Citizens did not feel obliged to vote within their own pillar anymore, and party balances became fluid. The KVP gradually lost its voter share. The ARP and CHU did so as well, but in a significantly slower pace. In 1967 the confessional parties even lost their majority. Moreover, only a year before that a new, fairly influential progressive social-democratic party was created that aimed for radical democratic changes: Democraten '66 or D'66<sup>134</sup>. At the same time, a similar movement quickly won influence in the PvdA: Nieuw Links (New Left). Another noticeable change in Dutch politics is the succession of some political icons. Around 1960 the party leaders that coloured politics in the preceding decades, left the political scene, such as Drees (PvdA), Romme (KVP), Schouten (ARP) and Oud (VV). In the sixties no real iconic figures replaced the void they left behind, although there were obviously new influential political figures that took the stage. Despite all the growing differences among the different parties, most government coalitions cooperated well, probably because the then issues became ever more complex.<sup>135</sup>

In terms of foreign policy, after the Second World War the Netherlands dropped its apparently failed policy of staying neutral. Instead, it took sides with other Western-European nations and joined atlantic structures such as the NATO. It was also to become a founding member of several intergovernmental organisations in Europe, most eye-catching and relevant of which are the predecessors of the current European Union. West-Germany, as discusse above, followed the same path and therefore the Netherlands and West-Germany became very close allies. As a sidenote, the internal/foreign politics of the Netherlands after the Second World War were rather preoccupied with the process of decolonisation. Particularly the violent transition in current-day Indonesia, to use a euphemism, took centre stage for a few years.<sup>136</sup>

§IV.2 Teldersstichting

The history of political liberalism in the Netherlands does not reveal a straight line. Although liberal politicians often formed a majority in the Dutch parliament, the first liberal political party was only created in 1885, the 'Liberale Unie'. Subsequently many split-offs, fusions and name changes occurred. Finally, in January 1948 the VVD was founded in Amsterdam, although its charter was only laid down two years later. The party was a fusion of the 'Partij van de Vrijheid' and the 'Comité-Oud'. With the fusion not all Dutch liberals had been united, as other parties also encompassed liberal wings or components. The VVD mostly attracted the more conservative liberals. The Volkspartij voor Vrijheid en Democratie did not include 'liberalism' in its name, however, as the term was still associated with the economic malaise of the 1930's.<sup>137</sup>

Also stimulated by the electoral successes of the party, its members wanted to strengthen their position by erecting organisations that had to promote the liberal cause. Observing that their political competitors all had a scientific bureau, the VVD decided it could not stay behind. In 1953 it founded the 'Prof. mr. B.M. Teldersstichting', named after the late party chairman of one of the pre-war predecessors of the VVD. The

Teldersstichting had the goal to conduct political-scientific research from a liberal perspective. In liberal fashion, the scientific bureau was created as an independent foundation. The succinct<sup>138</sup> VVD annuals even mention the scientific bureau only twice, both in its capacity as author of a report. Unfortunately, little material about or from the Teldersstichting has been archived during the postwar period. The only documents are available, are the minutes from the 'Commission for the studying of the developments concerning the business organisations pertaining to public law' and a file that contains 'Part 1 of the announcements from the board of governors in 1964'. Unfortunately, these are not very relevant for this research. Chronicles of the history of the VVD also barely mention the Teldersstichting. The lack of archival material from the Teldersstichting and Dutch liberalism in general during the postwar period and before, even prompted liberals to question what its causes could be. Several answers have been proposed, such as a believed limited group feeling among liberals. Liberals would treasure their freedom and individualism more than others, which would explain the lack of incentive to put time and effort into archiving a group's history. As a solution to the lack of archive material, digging into personal archives has been proposed. The result was that indeed liberals tended to have big personal archives, however these consisted primarily of material that was publicly available anyway, namely official publications.<sup>139</sup>

SIV.2.1 Publications of the Teldersstichting<sup>140</sup>

The Teldersstichting produced two sorts of scientific publications in the postwar period. First, it produced 19 reports. These reports can be seen as elaborate scientific articles, all centred around one theme or question, with some of them about an economic issue. Second, it published shorter scientific articles in the 'Liberaal Reveil'. The Liberaal

<sup>138</sup> Combining all annuals of the VVD from 1948 to 1970 would result in a 178 page document. In contrast, the smallest single ARP annual was 172 pages long. Besides, most were even well over 300 pages long.

<sup>140</sup> Most of the facts presented in this section are the result of personally going through the archive of the Liberaal Reveil. The dataset was a result of this as well. Part of the dataset can also be deducted from Appendix C, which was also created by the author.

Reveil was a scientific journal which was originally published solely under responsibility of the Stichting Liberaal Reveil, another independent foundation erected by the VVD, in 1955. The goal of the Liberaal Reveil, meaning 'liberal revival', was deepening and spreading liberal principles and the application of these principles on political, societal, economical and cultural matters. The journal should not be the mouthpiece of the VVD, but give room for an open liberal discussion. In the Reveil the Teldersstichting saw the perfect partner for publishing its scientific articles that were too short to publish as a separate report, something which the Stichting and the editors of the Reveil immediately acknowledged in the opening words of their very first edition in 1956. The cooperation between the two foundations was excellent from the start, and could be seen throughout the first years of the Reveil. Not only did the Teldersstichting actually get the space to publish their smaller articles, the editors of the Reveil also regularly dedicated attention to the occasional reports produced by the Teldersstichting. After several years of satisfaction from both sides, in 1962 the Stichting and the Teldersstichting decided to publish the Reveil together from then onwards.<sup>141</sup>

As can be seen in table IV.2.1 above, the quantity of numbers, articles and pages that the Reveil produced, differed quite greatly in a relative short time. It went from 4 numbers a year to 8, and back to 6 again. The coupled number of articles and pages show the same movement. The reason behind these movements is simple: money. The liberal Reveil did not have a large, loyal segment of society that provided a steady flow of funding. Moreover, the VVD was permanently short on funds, and did not support the independent Reveil. The Reveil had to rely on its own funding, which was provided by the revenues from the publication. As a result, the Reveil was relatively expensive. During the years in which it produced 4 numbers, which amounted to fewer than 100 pages, subscribers had to pay f5,50, which corresponds to approximately €18,- in 2016, corrected for inflation. With the doubling in numbers, the price nearly tripled to f15,-, or €42,-. Indeed, this happened in 1962, the year when the Teldersstichting and the Stichting Liberaal Reveil started to publish the scientific journal together. With this profound cooperation, also the decision was taken to greatly expand the number of people that were involved with the publication. A concrete example of this decision is the creation of a 'council of editors' of around 40 people, where previously only an editors staff existed of around 12 people. A few years later, 8 numbers a year for the said price appeared not to be sustainable. The Reveil therefore decided to lower its production to 6, in order to not have to raise the subscription fee any further. Much information about the number of subscribers is not available, although what is known is that it was 3686 in publishing year 1966-67.<sup>142</sup>

The Liberaal Reveil started off as a scientific journal in which nearly all the space was dedicated to scientific articles only. Only incidentally book reviews appeared, and if they did in total they would not use more than 2 pages. The only real uncommon addition to the journal was the inclusion of 1 to 3 quotes of famous liberals in particular. Interestingly, Erhard and Röpke made it into the quote section too. Röpke's quote was one against collectivism.<sup>143</sup> Erhard, who was granted the full page, was one promoting prosperity for all through competition, promoting democracy and the free market economy over dictatorship and a dirigist economy.<sup>144</sup> Also remarkable was the inclusion of a quote by the Swiss protestant theologist Karl Barth, the only author to have written a full German article in the scientific journal linked to the ARP. The quote was a religious quote in which is explained that objects have to serve man, not the other way round.<sup>145</sup> More religious and social quotes were included in the first years of the publication. For example, a quote from one of the editors of the Reveil, N. van Esveld, that argues that the social question revolves around living the life as God meant it.<sup>146</sup> Even John Maynard Keynes made it into the journal. Other than these quotes and the occasional book reviews, only scientific articles were published in the Liberaal Reveil. There were no political chronicles, neither internal or external. In 1962 the Reveil received a makeover. From then on political chronicles were regularly included, although they only focused on Dutch politics. Moreover, book reviews were included more often. During all these years, no foreign books have been reviewed, so no ordoliberal books either. From 1962 onwards all editions would also include a concise cv/biography of the different authors in that number. In addition, images, comical excerpts from political conversations and other jokes were included to liven up the journal. All in all, the Reveil was still very clearly a Table IV.3.2 The most productive authors of the Liberaal Reveil in the postwar period.

*Active as an individual author. Most on this list were part of the editorial staff before they wrote an article individually.

In table IV.3.2 above, the most productive authors of the Liberaal Reveil in the postwar period are listed. Together they wrote nearly a quarter of the total number of articles. If one excludes the articles that represented the views of the whole editorial staff, which numbered 94, the percentage would draw close to 30%. However, if one takes into account that nearly all<sup>148</sup> of the authors on the productive list have been on the editorial staff, which means that their opinions were included in the editorial pieces, one can readily argue that the table above includes the most quantitatively influential authors of the Reveil. In sheer numbers Nordlohne and Vrind stick out. The former was part of the editorial staff from the very beginning and stayed there for nearly the whole researched period. From 66 to 68 he was even editor-in-chief. Subsequently he took a step back, although he continued writing. Nordlohne wrote on wide-ranging topics, although often from a somewhat bigger scale, looking at ideologies (mostly liberalism), movements within those ideologies, relations of topical issues with freedom, et cetera. Vrind also wrote on a wide range of topics, although he focused more on economic themes. His topics were most often not so ideological, but a lot more concrete, such as 'pier prices'. Vrind was a part-time teacher, part-time journalist. Nordlohne, who was born in Warsaw and studied economics in St. Gallen and Rotterdam, was a public servant. As Nordlohne, Fockema Andreeae was part of the original editorial staff. Until 1950 he had several positions in the public service and he was even briefly State Secretary of War. From 1951 onwards he was a banker, with in addition scores of positions in supervisory boards. Numans was the parliamentary editor at the NRC, a major national newspaper. Joekes too worked as a journalist at the NRC and also the British BBC, although not in conjunction with his work for the Reveil. From 1962 to 1965, plus a brief period in 1969, he was the editor-in-chief of the scientific journal. In total he worked at the Teldersstichting from 1960 to 1968. During a number of years, he combined his liberal scientific work with his political career. He became a member of parliament in 1963 and kept this position until 1989. Heijmans had a somewhat similar career. He combined his work for the Reveil with his work at the Algemeen Dagblad, another big national newspaper. Subsequently he spent many years as a parliamentarian. Kappeyne van de Coppello too made the step to national politics after having been active for the Reveil. Before becoming a member of parliament in 1971, she had already spent a few years in local politics. Van Riel also had a history of local politics. His writing for the Reveil coincided with him taking up an enduring parliamentary position. Van Riel's protégé, Hans Wiegel, wrote for the Reveil and combined that with his career at the JOVD, the youth department of the VVD. Within a few years he became the political leader of the VVD. Another heavyweight was the aforementioned Oud. Oud wrote the first article in the Reveil in 1956, and had been the political leader of both the VVD and two of its predecessors, for example. He had also written the party's first manifesto of principles.<sup>149</sup>

All in all, several interesting observations can be made. First, there had been VVD politicians who were given plenty of space to write in the independent Reveil. Second, quite some writers used to be journalists, or combined that work with their work for the scientific journal. Third, and most interestingly, many prolific writers subsequently joined the national politics. Although one could imagine several plausible theories that would explain these observations, the observation as such is already relevant. If flows of ideas are hard to establish from person to person, with the movement of persons they take their ideas with them, at least initially. In addition to the observations that can be derived from the preceding section, some more observations can be made. First, the great majority of the editorial staff are based in the provinces of North-Holland and South-Holland. For example, in 1956 literally all 11 members came from those regions. From those, 6 were from Amsterdam. The second observation is that nearly all of the productive authors listed in table IV.3.2, were either nondenominational or lost their faith in the early sixties.<sup>150</sup>

With regards to content several global comments can be made. First of all, especially during the first few years of its publication, the Reveil had many articles that revolved around ideologies, most in particular liberalism of course. Articles often argued what they saw as liberalism, and for example how it related to other ideologies. Although the share of these kind of articles slowly declined, in absolute numbers it did not. This changed near the end of the sixties, when they suddenly barely appeared anymore. Do not be mistaken, ideologies were still pervasive throughout the journal, but not as a topic itself. So where topics used to revolve around ideologies and concrete policies were given as examples, subsequently topics revolved around concrete policy proposals and ideologies or their (implicit) premises were used as support. Or to put it even differently and also a little overstated: the journal grossly developed from a narrow selection of broad topics to a broad selection of narrow topics. The other general observations fit perfectly in this picture. Throughout the years, the number of topics about the VVD and about political manoeuvring increased. Editions fully dedicated to one theme, for example the upcoming elections, markedly increased over time as well. The same goes for articles that covered a foreign topic, particularly in the late sixties. During the first ten years of its existence, the Reveil thought that the modern liberal direction should also be attractive to humanists, catholics, protestants and jews alike, because there are no inherent ideological inconsistencies. Moreover, there were no problems with socialism, which was even seen as a branch of liberalism, albeit more radical and to the left with their plans for socialisation and a planned economy. Around halfway the sixties an extended internal dialogue erupted, that revolved around the question whether the VVD should still refer to the christian origins of the Dutch society. The argument was not settled with a clear winner; both sides received plenty support. The discussion can be marked as beginning as the shift away from ideological discussions in the Reveil. In addition, it was an interesting illustration of the changing society itself.

Especially the first years of the Liberaal Reveil contained a lot of reflections on what liberalism is, where it came from and where it should be heading. From these pieces, it immediately becomes obvious that liberals do not only see the good points, but also several points for improvement with regards to prior liberal policies. Immaterial liberal policies in particular have been very successful, according to these pieces. These included all sorts of civil liberties, such as the freedom of thought and equality rights. Material liberal ideas were looked at with more criticism. In general property rights and the like have been very important, but it also led to unwanted excesses. Referring to great former liberals, such as the 19th century Thorbecke, the authors in the Reveil argued that even old liberals were concerned with this matter and warned for these excesses. Therefore, it was beyond doubt that ‘modern liberalism’ had to tackle these issue. ‘Modern liberalism’ was a term that was often used in the Reveil. The sheer use of the word ‘modern’, a pronoun with a positive connotation, put beyond doubt that liberalism was or should be doing things differently than their non-modern predecessors.

Modern liberalism had been described by several authors, all in their own way. Although different words had been used, it is quite straightforward to distil its main points. To start, there is the price mechanism, which should spread power throughout society. For a fully functioning price mechanism three points were seen as important. Income should be spent freely as much as possible; entrepreneurs should compete with each other to gain the highest profits; differentiation in the rewards for labour. There were still plenty of tasks for the government. All its citizens needed to have purchasing power, so sometimes it was urgent to redistribute the national income. To have a fully functioning production apparatus, the state had to fight power concentrations. Imbalances in economic cycles had to be compensated. Good and accessible education had to provide a capable work force. Also measures like income taxes, wealth taxes and social security measures had to be taken. Even heavy inheritance and donation taxes were supported, and the same goes for expansive monetary policies. Overall it sounds closer to ordoliberalism than to paleoliberalism of course, because of all the social goals and state tasks. However, the ideas in the Reveil were clearly closest to keynesianism. Particularly the repeated references to the need of anti-cyclical policies were striking. In sharp contrast to the German ordoliberals, it was even accepted among the authors, that it was stated that with regards to the necessity of these anti-cyclical policies, there was no difference between socialists and liberals. What the liberals did note, however, was that countries should be aware that the state should not creepingly take over ever-larger shares of the national income. Therefore, once a recession was over, the state should be attentive to shrinking itself again. Although the 'modern liberals' definitely saw some similar tasks for the state as the ordoliberals did, the overall theoretical approach was somewhat different too. The modern liberals saw state and the growing bureaucracy as a necessary result of liberal policies. If one wants to achieve liberal goals, state agencies simply have to be created. Once the agencies grow too large and thereby become too formalistic, the state ironically has to create another state agency that has to correct the formalistic behaviour of the other agencies. In the late sixties the build-up of the arguments in the Reveil began to change noticeably. The now more narrow concrete topics that were discussed, were often not backed by the whole load of modern liberal ideas. The attention clearly shifted towards the workings of the price mechanism. This is not to say that the Reveil grew into a paleoliberal journal, for it did not start arguing that less government is the solution to everything. The quite sudden shift in focus to the ‘private side’ of the liberal argument is remarkable, though.

It is important to underscore that the Reveil only published from 1956 onwards. In the preceding postwar years there were no liberal, VVD-affiliated scientific journals. According to articles in the Reveil itself, liberalism had several developments during that period. Directly after the war, the liberals mainly fought against socialism and socialisation. They favoured lower taxes, more manoeuvring space for businesses, a reduction of the state budget and government tasks, and thought a monetary balance was pivotal. Subsequently, as seen above, the liberals advocated a more positive approach. Instead of focusing on what the government cannot do, liberals started to point out what it can do. Also, they developed more ‘modern’ approaches with regards to economic policy. In addition, social feelings clearly increased. Unfortunately, no exact dates of the emergence of the described developments had been pinpointed. Otherwise it would be interesting to link these developments with the publications of the Reveil and the work of the Teldersstichting.<sup>151</sup>

About foreign relations not that many comments can be made. The authors in the Reveil did not give that much attention to foreign developments, except in the late sixties. This is not to say that the authors of the Reveil promoted nationalism, because occasionally a plead for an open mind with regards to foreign developments did appear. According to an article that separated an ideological and an economic foreign politics approach, the Dutch liberal approach had always been dominated by the economic one. This approach is more opportunistic and most often favours peace and free trade. If an ideologic stance would be bad for business, the economic one always prevails. This also explains the liberals’ stance against decolonisation. The FDP had also been analysed in the Reveil. The German party was not considered too favourably, because the author thought it was not a proper liberal party. He argued that due to the federal structure of the party, too many opportunist, nationalists and pragmatics had joined the party. This resulted in a blurry political colour. Although this view is not too favourable, then FDP leader Erich Mende received the space to post an article of his in the Reveil, which was translated into Dutch. Mende pleaded for far-reaching European integration, including on a political level.

By far the most interesting article is a piece by the prolific Nordlohne in 1960. In this article, he points at Röpke and Erhard and tries to convince the reader that the Netherlands should go in exactly the direction promoted by them. Although Nordlohne only incidentally referred to them again, apparently the most prolific writer of the Reveil was indeed convinced by ordoliberal ideas, or so he was at the time of writing the article. By the way, Nordlohne did not call the ideas promoted by Röpke and Erhard ordoliberalism, but 'economic humanism'. Throughout the years numerous references to humanism have been made in the Reveil, also sometimes in relation to economic subjects, but references to 'economic humanism' as such have not been found again.<sup>152</sup>

With regards to the reports produced by the Teldersstichting, not that much additional information to the narrative above can be added. The 19 different reports in the postwar period all had a different set of authors. Sometimes it was only one author, other times a commission of a near dozen men was created that were responsible for putting the report together. Often the authors were part of either the board of governors of the Teldersstichting, or appeared (occasionally) in the Reveil. There were 'external' contributors as well. What all reports have in common, is that the board of governors of the Teldersstichting fully backed them. The reports were therefore published with the Teldersstichting as the writing authority, and one had to look for its human contributors in the foreword of the report. Interesting to mention is that the first chairman of the board of governors was a keynesian oriented economist, Hendrikus Johannes Witteveen. Witteveen was invited by the famous Tinbergen to work at the then just created CPB in 1945. Witteveen promoted cum laude with Tinbergen and two years later, at the age of 27, he became a professor of political economy, economic cycles and economic politics. Within a few years he would also make it to parliament, Minister of Finance and leader of the IMF. Before that, however, he often contributed to the reports of the Teldersstichting.<sup>153</sup>

The reports varied greatly in size and also in topics and themes. The smallest was one about economic cycles with only 15 pages, of which only 9 pages of actual text. There were also several reports that were a lot larger, such as the one about open entrepreneurship with over 400 pages. As a result, the prices varied widely too. Some were less than a Dutch guilder, others more than 10, but most in between 2 and 5 guilders. Most reports were about concrete topics, which resulted in a set of advices based on scientific research. The topics were very diverse, from divorce to education, from plant breeder rights to rent legislation. Not surprisingly the approach in the reports varied a lot too. Some were very empiric, with mostly references to the source of the numbers. Others were a lot more theoretical, with mostly references to authorities, such as the CPB or to parliament with all its acts and laid down proceedings. References to literature varied from nil to several dozen. In most reports the literature references were nearly exclusively to Dutch sources. A remarkable observation was that often references to authors or institutions of a different political colour were made, from christian labour unions to the scientific bureau of the social-democratic PvdA. In some reports, quite a few Anglosaxon sources were used as well, such as Keynes, Schumpeter (in English) and Galbraith. Only one ordoliberal was referred to. A quote of Böhm was used as an implicit argument why no one can rationally oppose co-determination of employees.<sup>154</sup>

The development of the economic arguments in the reports of the Teldersstichting are very similar to those in the Reveil. In 1962 the tasks of the government was still formulated as follows. First, the government had to prevent unemployment on the one hand and inflation on the other, by combining anti-cyclical policies with a powerful and balanced economic growth. Second, it had to protect the economically weaker by means of social provisions. Thirdly, it had to ensure a reasonable amount of competition by combating cartels and other economic power concentrations. Fourthly, it had to improve infrastructure. The price function had a coordinating function. Extra government tasks were not a problem at all. This all sounds rather keynesian. Actually, in 1959 a report was published about what policies to use in economic cycles, with a total of one reference, namely to none other than John Maynard Keynes himself. In 1965 a report appeared that already sounded markedly different. It warns for something which had ‘often been quoted abusively’, namely ‘sliding down the slide to collectivism’ by laying down the economic development. This sounds a lot like both Hayek and ordoliberalism. It continues by stating that the strengthening of the price mechanism has two pillars, namely improving the supply of information to market parties, and government policy should be in harmony with the economy. Examples of this would be appropriate economic cycle politics, aiming for a certain market order, competition policies, improving sectors that staid behind such as agriculture. According to the report, correcting acts by the government could not simply be dismissed if one has modern thoughts, including liberal. After this short summary, the report spent pages upon pages on warning that the government should be very careful extending its powers, just because of the fear of collectivism. Although the contents of the points described above sound like ordoliberalism, the tone sounds more like Hayek or even Friedman. The emphasis really is not on what the government can do, but rather on why it should be extremely careful with everything it does. In 1970 a report was published that is typical for many articles that had been written since the end of the sixties. This subtitle of this report about how to improve traffic says it all, really: ‘more roads and a more efficient usage of the roads by using price mechanics for driving and parking’. The whole report is imbued with solving problems by introducing the market mechanism. Literally all the traffic and parking problems could be solved by the market mechanism. It sounds just as religious as Friedman and the paleoliberals that wanted the government to pull out of the economy to leave room for the market. Surprisingly however, if one looks at the concrete policy proposals, the government is to act, not to pull back. For example, the government should classify cars for different tax payments, the government should tax car drivers based on how many kilometres they drive, the government should break taxi cartels and the government should make use of differential parking prices for different parking zones and different parking places. So the rhetorics of this report definitely moved closer to the paleoliberals, but the concrete policy proposals could easily be defended by ordoliberal theory.<sup>155</sup>

§IV.3 Doctor Abraham Kuyperstichting

The ARP was the first political party in the Netherlands. It was founded in 1879 by Abraham Kuyper, the namegiver of the scientific bureau. Under the umbrella of the ARP, Kuyper united most antirevolutionary forces in the Netherlands. These forces were calvinistic reformed protestants, who were strongly opposed to the ideas of the French Revolution that stated that the authority of government stems from the people, not from the biblical god. God's word as written in the bible should be the guide and guideline of real world practices and policies, including those of the government. The party was one of the most influential parties before the Second World War, which they largely accomplished by Kuyper's political philosophy of the 'antithesis'. Kuyper managed to revolve politics around the axis of confessionals versus non-confessionals, as opposed to historically more common axes such as conservatism versus progressivism, or socialism versus liberalism. This way Kuyper and his ARP were part of the religious coalition, who were to be the majority for most of the pre-war periods. The antithesis also made it possible for the ARP to attract all sorts of reformed protestant voters, from progressive to conservative. The party was known for attracting voters from all social ranks, but especially those from the mid to lower social classes.<sup>156</sup>

Already before the Second World War the ARP decided to create a scientific bureau, the Doctor Abraham Kuyperstichting (1921). Under the nazi regime, during which relatively many ARP members were actively involved in the resistance, the scientific work was halted. Immediately after the war, the ARP regrouped and also the Kuyperstichting got things going again. Actually, these two happened simultaneously. Although the Kuyperstichting had quite a large degree of independence from the ARP, the two organisations were still intertwined. Without going into too much detail, several organs of the ARP could all elect several controlling board members of the scientific bureau. These board members then chose the daily management from within their ranks. The intertwinement ensured the Kuyperstichting would remain faithful to the goals the ARP set out when founding the scientific bureau. To paraphrase, the goal of the Kuyperstichting was to improve and spread the ideology on which the ARP was based. It had to do so by further enhancing the knowledge of the ‘eternal fundamentals of God’s word’, and to research how these could be applied to politics and society in general. The grounding charter identified four different means of achieving this. First, a library plus reading room had to be created, which would enable people to increase their knowledge about the ideology on which the ARP is based and about the task of the ARP itself. Second, scientists needed to be recruited, who would devote themselves to increasing the described knowledge. Thirdly, writings had to be dispersed. Fourthly, all other legal means to reach the aforementioned goal, could be used.<sup>157</sup>

To start with the fourth means, in the archives no such other legal means can be found that are worth mentioning. The first means, the library, are not to be neglected. The grounding charter includes much detailed information about the workings of such a library. Most relevant is that books were sent all around the country, just for the cost of the stamp on the package; there were no borrowing fees. In the especially the annuals from 1956 and onwards, rather detailed information about the library were included. To start, the exact number of lent out packages, which averaged in between 4 and 5 books, were registered. This way it can be observed that the number of lent out packages grew from 895 in 1947 to its maximum of 1784 in 1957. Throughout the years this steadily declined to only 378 in 1969. This decline even prompted the scientific bureau to switch to counting in absolute number of books only, instead of packages. Part of the decline can be explained by the fact that the acquisition of a copy machine brought about the possibility of lending out photo copies of specific pages, which were not registered in the statistics. In addition to the simple quantity statistics, the packages were furthermore classified in 40 to 50 different themes. The observation can be made that throughout the years, ‘Anti-Revolutionary direction’, ‘general political issues’, ‘administrative law’ and ‘affairs of church and religion’ all made it to the top 6 in nearly all years on record. No other incidentally high ranking topics on the list remained there for a longer period, and could have simply been topical issues during that year. Some examples of these include ‘biographies (many about Calvin)’, ‘breakthrough P.v.d.A.’ and ‘war issues’. The themes

most relevant for our research would be ‘economic issues’, ‘liberal direction’<sup>158</sup> and arguably ‘socialist direction’. To start with the latter two, these were mostly rather marginal topics of interests. In most years the amount of sent out packages of these themes did not get into the double digits, with some clear exceptions around 1960. In 1958 the ‘social direction’ reached its peak of 48 out of 1741 packages, a year later the ‘liberal direction’ peaked with 31 out of 1604. There have not been any years on record in which the interest for the ‘liberal direction’ outperformed the ‘socialist direction’. The interest in ‘economic issues’<sup>159</sup> fluctuated quite a bit throughout the years. In 1954 it was not a popular theme yet, with only 18 out of 1321 packages. The interest grew in the next few years, reaching 43 in 1955, 64 in 1956 and 79 in 1957. Despite the declining total number of lent out packages, ‘economic issues’ remained popular and even reached 84 in 1959 and 1963. That is quite a significant amount, making it respectively the fifth and fourth most popular themes in those years. In 1964 the interest suddenly dropped to 18, around which level it had remained since. What all these statistics combined show, is that the target group of the Kuyperstichting was not neglecting economic issues, but it was not their main concern either. There were clearly other issues that grasped their interest a lot more, such as questions about antirevolutionary principles or churchly matters. However, throughout the years the Kuyperstichting could have definitely influenced some in their economic thinking by lending out their still substantial number of economic themed packages.<sup>160</sup>

Back to the different means of the scientific bureau for reaching its goals. The library needed qualified people to operate it, and to make use of it for furthering the antirevolutionary knowledge. In the annuals the exact employees of the Kuyperstichting can be found. The daily management and the other board members actually were not really involved with the daily practices of the scientific bureau, but served more as checks

<sup>158</sup> The names of the themes changed throughout the years, but remain identifiable in nearly all cases. ‘Liberalism and related groups’ should equal ‘liberal direction’, for example.

<sup>159</sup> In some years the account made distinctions between the themes ‘economic issues’, ‘economics (general)’ and ‘economic state’.

in the ARP system. Therefore these people were not even included as personnel in the administration of the bureau itself. Most years it had 3-5 academic employees, plus 6-10 supporting staff. Throughout the years it only increased slowly. One of the employees was always the director. The first one after the Second World War was K. Groen, who stayed in this position until 1957. J.H. Prins, who had been the scientific assistant until then, took over from him and finally W.C.D. Hoogendijk took charge in 1968. In 1956 the position of economic assistant was created, which G. Hoogerwerf had briefly filled for two years. His successor, Bob Goudzwaard, held out much longer and fully stopped in 1967. The Kuyperstichting had trouble filling the subsequent vacancy; the position remained empty for atleast until 1972. Unmentioned so far have been the librarian and the judicial assistant. The influence of the latter two on the economic contents of the small academic team was probably marginal.<sup>161</sup>

Before the scientific journal of the Kuyperstichting is discussed, it is interesting to look at the financing of the bureau. In the original founding years in the beginning of the twenties, the scientific bureau knew to raise around a mllion of Dutch guilders, which was a very substantial sum of money around that time. Because a large share was robbed during the Second World War, a new 'million plan' was initiated in 1946. Ultimately the Kuyperstichting could only scrap together around than a tenth of the wished amount. This meant the scientific bureau could not cover all its costs. Actually it had always had funding problems according to the Kuyperstichting itself, also because they always wanted to do more than they financially could afford. To make ends meet, the scientific bureau partly relied on direct ARP party funding in most of its years. From 1947 to 1968 the party mostly contributed in between 16 thousand and 25 thousand Dutch guilders. In absolute numbers no real trend is visible, so in relative terms this meant that the party's contribution decreased. If one takes into account that the scientific bureau increasingly spent more money throughout the years, that meant that the bureau became ever more financially independent. Whereas the 22 thousand Dutch guilders were more than 20% of the budget of the Kuyperstichting in 1958, the 25 thousand Dutch guilders in 1968 were approximately 10% of the budget in 1968. The continued party 'subsidies' at some point were accounted as 'compensation'. That most likely had to do with the fact that the scientific bureau thought they put way too much energy into fulfilling the task of secretariat for nearly all the party commissions, all officially for free.<sup>162</sup>

Having discussed the ARP party contribution to the scientific bureau, where did the rest of the funding come from? Interestingly, during the whole postwar period, the largest share of income came from investments. The Kuyperstichting still had some pre-war assets left, and those combined with the immediate postwar funding were used for investing. The investing was restricted to some rules, which defined what the maximum percentage could be that was spent on a certain investment. Although these percentages and rules changed over time, the four groups that made up the largest share were the following. Showcasing the example of 1955, first a maximum of 40% could be invested in lending money that would be used for building christian schools. Second, 30% could be used for providing mortgages to churches and ther religious institutes. Thirdly, another 30% could be used for other loans to churches and religious intitutes. Lastly, also a maximum of 30% could be used for solid stocks and bonds. In the year accounts the results of these investments were shown. Occassionally even the newly bought stocks were specified. Throughout the years the budget of the Kuyperstichting continuously grew from 71 thousand Dutch guilders in 1956<sup>163</sup> to 319 thousand in 1970. Approximately two thirds of the spending had always gone to costs of personnel.<sup>164</sup>

§IV.3.1 Antirevolutionaire Staatkunde

The Kuyperstichting published a scientific journal as well: the 'Antirevolutionaire Staatkunde'. Its editorial staff mostly consisted of externals though. Even the two chairmen, J. Schouten (1946-1962) and W.P. Berghuis (1962-1977), had never been part of the personnel of the scientific bureau. By virtue of its office, the director of the Kuyperstichting was the secretary of the Staatkunde's editors, though. The scientific journal targeted the party elite, which included councillors, board members of electors' associations and other antirevolutionaries in leading positions. Therefore the number of subscribers was not spectacularly high. It ranged from 1500 to 1950, although after an <sup>163</sup> In the annuals before 1956 the yearly budgets were not accounted for in numbers. The scientific bureau only spoke about finances in general terms.

enduring slow decline it dropped below 1500 in 1969, including student subscriptions. The price of a subscription did not increase that much over time, with only f4,75 a year in 1947 and f9,75 near the end of the postwar period in 1969. In contemporary terms that equals €22,45 and €19,80 a year. It was not as cheap as the ARP's 'propaganda magazine' though, the 'Nederlandsche Gedachten'. Appearing 20 times for only f3,- a year, that magazine explicitly tried to sell itself as being the 'cheapest magazine in the country', thereby aiming for the non-elite antirevolutionaries.<sup>165</sup>

The focus is on the copies of the Antirevolutionaire Staatkunde though, as this was the only publication under the responsibility of the Kuyperstichting. As shown above, it was one of the main means for achieving the goals of the scientific bureau, which boiled down to furthering, expanding and spreading the antirevolutionary ideology based on God's word. As is implied in table IV.3.1 below, the journal basically appeared once a month. However, most years included one or two editions that were double numbers. The first edition appeared in April 1947, and all other years started counting in January. The average number of pages was 375, and appeared to be a little lower near the end of the sixties than during the first years after its postwar reappearance. The number of articles became notably higher though. This meant the average number of pages per article decreased throughout time, which becomes obvious when studying the material and appeared to be a conscious decision of the editorial staff, after readers complained they would like to read somewhat smaller articles. Articles of 20 pages or more were anything but an exception, and a few times even articles that were nearly 50 pages were included. Although it differed greatly, scientific articles took up around two thirds of the journal's space. The remaining third was mostly either used for the book reviews section, or for the 'advice section'. Sometimes both sections were included, and sometimes one of the two even took up half of the edition.<sup>166</sup>

Table IV.3.1 Metadata Antirevolutionaire Staatkunde.

The book reviews are discussed first, as the ARP including the Kuyperstichting considered the library function one of their most important tasks, which somehow makes sense for a party that wants to reduce all their ideas to a book: the Bible. During many years, the Staatkunde even included more book reviews than articles, for example in 1948, 1952 and 1957. However, during some other years the priority seemed to have been elsewhere. From 1960 to 1968 the number fluctuated around a total of 10, before more than doubling again in 1969. There are several things that are noticeable when studying the book reviews. First, the reviewers overlap with the authors of ordinary articles in the journal; there were no dedicated reviewers. Second, a large share of the authors of the reviewed books also overlapped with those authors of ordinary authors. A third, related observation is that the topics of the reviewed books overlap a lot with the topics in the ordinary articles. Most reviewed books that had not written an article in the Staatkunde, still clearly fitted into matters that were of importance to antirevolutionaries. A great load of books had religious themes, or were looking at a societal issue from a religious perspective. During the end of the postwar period a somewhat broader range of books had been reviewed. That three observations still hold true though, albeit in a somewhat lesser extent for that period. Another example of the rather closed circle of authors and topics, is the incredibly low number of reviews of foreign books, which is fewer than 10 in the near-quarter of a century. No ordoliberal works have been reviewed, and only one economic foreign book, namely Galbraith's The Affluent Society. Considering the tone in most of the Staatkunde's pieces, the reviewer was surprisingly positive about this work.<sup>167</sup>

The advices segment of the Staatkunde was of a comparatively large size as the book review sections, perhaps even bigger. The format was that of a question and answer session. Readers could send their questions to the Kuyperstichting, and the Staatkunde would publish both the question plus the answer. It is not entirely clear who was responsible for the answers, because hardly any advices included the author. Most probably the personnel of the Kuyperstichting were responsible though, for two reasons. First, the few advices that included initials at the end, coincided with initials of personnel of the Kuyperstichting, not with members of the Staatkunde's editors staff. Second, the Kuyperstichting reported in their annuals about written advices and placed them within themes that exactly coincided with the classifications used in the Staatkunde. The questions ranged from rather individual or small-scale problems to questions about the internal coherence of the party ideology. Examples of the former include the question of what the proper stance of an antirevolutionary should be if the local municipality allowed some citizens to play football on a Sunday, to whether a true antirevolutionary should allow mixed swimming and sunbathing. In general, most questions had to do with municipal or provincial politics, and concrete questions were asked about a specific problem. The answers were often several pages long and included lots of strict normative rhetoric, leaving no room for discussion. Nearly all, if not all answers were linked to either the ARP's official program, but even more so to the Bible. The sparse economic questions were approached similarly as in the ordinary articles, and are therefore together discussed below. The number of written advices decreased throughout the year and the advice section completely disappeared after 1964. This had not to do with the declining number of questions, but the switch from letters to contact in person and by telephone. Because the ARP and the Kuyperstichting wanted to keep up with the increasing scale of 'everything', in 1966 there was a clear change of focus from local matters to national matters. The scientific bureau started spending a lot more time on supporting ARP national committees with their advices, and even more so the number of advices to members of parliament increased. One year later the latter tie with parliamentarians was further strengthened, mostly due to financial subsidies from the government for this kind of work. One of the two members that got sucked up into the parliamentary work, was the irreplaceable economist of the Kuyperstichting, Bob Goudzwaard.<sup>168</sup>

The contents of the articles in the Staatkunde neatly fit into the narrative above. Whatever the topic was, it always had to be directly related to God's word as written into the Bible. It really did not matter whether it was about watching television, building houses or whether it was simply a biography, everything had to be traced back to God or linked to it. For the non-strictly religious calvinist, this often makes the trail of thought somewhat hard to understand, particularly when several authors disagreed with each other. The question at hand was always clearly stated, and even the conclusions can be followed. What happened in the middle though, was often just pages long of religious and ethical thoughts, often with references to specific Bible texts. Of course different authors had different styles, and there were also many very accessible articles, but those were still always related to either religious thoughts or to principles of antirevolutionary thought. Throughout the years, the strict religious reasoning loosened somewhat, although most pieces still had at least some references to religion. This development coincided with loosening the mostly normative form of reasoning. Instead of 'a proper antirevolutionary should' or 'a true christian has no choice but', the contemporary more usual tone of cautious reasoning slowly took hold. Besides, authors started becoming less decisive at what the solution to a problem should be. Ultimately during the second half of the sixties, more technical, specialised articles started to be published, where strong religious foundations appeared not to matter anymore. Coinciding with this trend, also more pieces about foreign events were published. Foreign events also appeared to trickle into national discussions. For example, antirevolutionaries considered the CDU a potential role model for merging with the other confessional parties during the sixties. Otherwise Germany did not take up a special interest in the Staatkunde, among the other nations. Do not be mistaken, although the described increasing openness is easily noticeable, even in 1970 the focus of the Staatkunde was still clearly on national policies, and religion remained central. The Kuyperstichting noticed parts of the described developments as well. Because the scientific bureau perceived some backlashes from its apparently more conservative readership, it felt the need to defend these developments by pointing to its inevitability due to the scaling-up in all spheres.<sup>169</sup>

The above development also coincides with changing ideas about economic issues and the role of government in general. Directly after the Second World War the Staatkunde was clearly against any other role for government other than keeping law and order, which included maintaining a capable army. Any other government interferences were called ‘subsidies’, which were all terrible, except for funding of denominational schools. Improper government intervention was only allowed if a negligent or impotent society brought about public injustices. Once such a dire problem was fixed, the government should retreat again. These principles should not lead to an ever-expanding government, for where catholics and socialists thought that the ‘government had a task, except...’, antirevolutionaries thought that ‘government did not have a task, except...’. Although this may sound somewhat like the ordoliberals or older liberal theories, who wanted to leave space for the market, the ideas were clearly different and definitely were not taken from the liberals. Free competition was seen as the source of social injustices and possessions by the devil, all of which the rise of economic liberalism and individualism were to blame for. During the later fifties some more progressive sounds started to find their way to the journal. According to them, several forms of social security were in line with the Bible. Other authors suppressed these ideas, although slowly but gradually more of these sounds could be heard. Economic policy ideas were still in line with the idea of a reserved government. Supporting small and medium enterprises could be helped, but only by subsidising entrepreneurial trainings, which sounds exactly like Röpke could have said it. A closer look quickly reveals this is not the case, as the main way of helping these enterprises would be inducing cartel formation. The way forward for antirevolutionary economics and christian economics in general was still considered to be ‘no other way but that of carrying crosses behind Christ, on a road that goes right against the compromising, pragmatic current zeitgeist’. Approximately halfway the sixties, the reality that the government meddled with more affairs than in the preceding decades, finally started to creep in. Instead of mostly opposing the expanded government as such, the less religiously strict texts tried to steer the government to more acceptable forms of interference. The ideas of liberalism that competition and search for profit would lead to spontaneous harmony, had failed by leading to ethical and societal injustices. Christian politics should step in by contributing to long-term economic and social planning. Economic statistics and econometrics were to help in this endeavour. Throughout all the years, direct links to ordoliberal ideas have not been found in the Staatkunde. Similarities in policy ideas were mostly upset by dissimilarities, and the antirevolutionary mostly strict religious trail of thinking differed greatly from the ordoliberal path to economic ideas.<sup>170</sup>

Table IV.3.2 The most productive authors of the Antirevolutionaire Staatkunde in the postwar period.

As can be seen in table IV.3.2 above, the Staatkunde had quite a few productive authors. Together the top 14 most productive writers wrote more than a third of all the articles. Hendrik Algra stands out most, both due the total amount and the long period during which he was active. The large number is a little misleading, as a large share of Algra's works were the 'summaries of the interior', which were brief summaries of mostly political events in the Netherlands, for which he was mainly responsible together with Evert Diemer. Algra wrote pieces about education too, a popular topic among antirevolutionaries. Important to note is that Algra was a member of the Dutch Senate ('Eerste Kamer') from 1946 until 1969. More authors on the list were political figures for the ARP. Wiert Berghuis was even the party chairman from 1956 to 1968, among many other political positions. The aforementioned economist Bob Goudzwaard also made his way into politics, after his work at the Kuyperstichting and for the Staatkunde. Most others (subsequently) were in political positions as well, such as Wil Albeda, Isaäc Diepenhorst and L.W.G. Scholten. The lattermost, the third on the most productive list, was mainly responsible for the 'summaries of the exterior'. All in all, the authors of the Staatkunde were firmly embedded in the ARP and its antirevolutionary family, just like the Kuyperstichting.<sup>171</sup>

§IV.4 KVP & Centrum voor Staatkundige Vorming

The story of the scientific bureau of the Katholieke Volkspartij (KVP) starts with the creation of the KVP itself. Shortly after the Second World War, there was a lot of criticism on the KVP's predecessor, the 'Rooms-Katholieke Staatspartij' (Roman-Catholic State Party), mostly because of its notable absence during the reign of the nazi's. Also as a clear sign for outsiders that things changed, the old party disbanded in December 1945 and was immediately followed by the KVP. Not just the name changed, however. The most important changes with regards to the direction the new party was taking, were on the one hand the distinctly more progressive course, and on the other hand the opening-up of the party to non-catholics. Both these changes also have to do with the realised decreasing influence of the bisschops in the party, and definitely cannot be separated from the wish to break with the past. With these changes, the KVP hoped to become a real people's party and gain support from all layers of the catholic society, plus becoming a viable alternative for the non-catholic electorate.<sup>172</sup>

Interestingly, the scientific bureau of the KVP was created before the KVP itself, namely in August 1945, so still under the auspices of its predecessor. One of the two driving forces behind the creation of the scientific bureau, was also influential in the invigorating of the catholic party, namely father Siegfried Stokman. The other driving force was Carl Romme, who about half a year later would emerge as the political leader of the KVP, which he remained until 1961. Although the latter prompted Romme to leave the scientific bureau, he and Stokman designed the shape the 'Centrum voor Staatkundige Vorming' (Centre for Political Education) would have until its disbandment.<sup>173</sup>

The Centrum basically was an institute that produced many in-depth reports on a wide array of topical political issues. It did so by selecting experts for committees that would work on a certain issue or question. Once a committee finished a concept report, it was sent around to all the different approximately 25 regional departments of the institute. In all those different departments, the local socially concerned people could check the report and propose amendments, before sending it back to the original group of experts. Taking all the proposed amendments into account, this expert committee would then submit their final product for publication to the Centrum's administration. To be clear, the original and local committees could differ greatly from topic to topic. Within five years of its existence, already more than a thousand different people have contributed in the different (local) committees. The people who contributed, ranged mostly from professors and other academics, to magistrates, leaders of societal organisations and high-ranking officials. What they had in common, is that had an affiliation with the topic at hand, and that nearly all of them were catholic.<sup>174</sup>

During the first few years of its existence, there was some discussion within the party ranks about the practical use of such a Centre. However, this discussion completely faded quickly, for even political foes observed the high impact of the reports of the Centrum. The advises in the reports were often adopted as the official KVP party line, and with these reports in hand the KVP standpoint was a lot harder to dismiss as simply a political opinion. The latter was even exacerbated by the fact that the KVP sometimes instead chose another party line than what report of the Centrum advised, which largely reduced the credibility of arguments of political opponents that targeted the bias of the Centrum's reports. The fact that the party sometimes<sup>175</sup> took another position than the Centrum, was also cause for another, more prolonged discussion about the scientific bureau. Namely, some KVP members feared that the Centrum would form a sort of party within the party itself and thereby undermine the authority of the KVP's politicians. According to them, the Centrum had to be a research bureau, not a political think tank. Their fears were arguably overstated, because in practice the leaders of the Centrum were very willing to listen to the needs of their party's wishes when it came to selecting the issues to research. Besides, because both the KVP and the scientific bureau consisted of nearly only catholics, the end-results of the reports nearly always fitted the party's narrative. Moreover, for this discussion it is important to mention that, despite the fact that the Centrum was claimed to be fully independent in its functioning, it was also fully financed by the KVP.<sup>176</sup>

Other than the described production of political reports, the Centrum was not engaged in any other relevant activities. Although its name may suspect otherwise, the 'Centre for Political Education' did not organise courses, seminars or information gatherings to spread the official party line. These propaganda activities were the party's responsibility, until the 'Vormingsinstituut der Katholieke Volkspartij' (Educational Institute of the Catholic People's Party) took over in September 1950. Actually, until September 1971 the scientific bureau was not even responsible for the publication of the KVP-related scientific journal. Until then this was officially the responsibility of the party bureau. However, just like the Centre's leadership, the editorial office claimed full autonomy and independence from the party leadership. In their support, there are no claims or other indications that the party leadership interfered unwantedly.<sup>177</sup>

SIV.4.1 Katholieke Staatkundig Maandschrift & Politiek<sup>178</sup>

Although the KVP's scientific journal was not yet the responsibility of its scientific bureau in our researched postwar years, an analysis of its work is still included. Because it largely fulfilled the same role as the other political parties' scientific journals, adding this information is useful. It sheds a clear light on the sort of economic ideas that were spread in the scientific journal of the KVP, thereby also facilitating better comparisons. KVP's scientific journal was first published under the name of 'Katholieke Staatkundig Maandschrift' (Catholic Political Monthly) in March 1947. As the name suggests, in principle the journal was published once a month. In practice, most years only ten or eleven editions were printed, with one or two being a double number. In Table IV.1.1 below, most years the KVP's monthly was able to provide its 12 numbers. The amount of published articles in most years ranged from the lower 40's to the lower 60's with the average a little more than 50. The amount of pages varied from around 300 to 500, with an average of more than 400.

In all these numbers a clear upward or downward trend cannot be spotted, also not if one looks at before and after the bold demarcation line in between 1963-64 and 1964-65, which represents the journal's change of name to Politiek. The change of name did not bring about any real changes. In fact, the editorial staff was unchanged and the front of the very first edition under the new name simply stated you were looking at an edition from the 18th year of the journal. So, why the name change, then? The editors thought the old name was both misleading and not covering the contents of the journal. Misleading, because the standpoints taken by the authors did not directly come from opposed to 'Politiek' (Politics), which covers more practical issues as well, such as very specific policies.<sup>179</sup>

If one browses through the several years and editions, most published numbers included 2 to 5 in-depth scientific articles that covered a topical issue of the time. These scientific articles always accounted for the lion's share of an edition. Moreover, most often a short account of a political (parliamentary) battle was included. In addition, many editions included one or more brief book reviews. Still looking at the format of the journal, it furthermore remarkable that the reports of the Centrum quite often found their way into it. First, the Centrum was the author of 13 different journal articles (see Table IV.4.2), which were often extensive excerpts or summaries of recently published reports. Second, the authors of the scientific journal itself often discussed the reports or referred to it. This mostly happened in 'normal articles', but sometimes the reports were also reviewed in the book review section. Thirdly, the journal often promoted the Centrum's reports by reserving a page for the list of available Centrum reports.

It cannot be considered strange that the Maandschrift and the Politiek both promoted the Centrum's reports, for they were both affiliated with the KVP. Indeed, both were even fully financed by the party. The revenue from selling the journals and reports also went straight into the party fund. In 1947 the yearly fee for the Maandschrift was f7,50, which corresponds to approximately €35,- in 2016, corrected for inflation. In 1970, the Politiek costed exactly double the amount in Dutch guilders, which is comparable to around €30,- in 2016. Students had to pay less. The pricetag on reports was the same for everyone, but differed greatly from report to report. In the first year, the reports had prices such as f0,15 and f0,30 cents. 20 years and nearly 150 reports later, prices hovered in between f1,- and f6,50. The circulation is unknown.<sup>180</sup>

Looking at the editorial staff, it obviously changed throughout time. Most striking is the editorial staff of the first editions. Out of the 7 named staff members, 2 are familiar, namely Stokman and Romme. The fact that the two driving forces behind the creation of the Centrum are staff members of the scientific journal as well, further explains the aforementioned link between the two KVP institutes. Indeed, Stokman was the editor-in-chief from 1947 up until 1958. Another interesting name of the first hour is Leo Albering, who was part of the editorial staff for nearly twenty years and who could share the title of most productive author in the KVP's journal (see Table IV.4.2)<sup>181</sup>. time was secretary of the KVP, from 1946 up to 1969, and director of the parteaubureau from 1947 to 1957. These examples show how intertwined the KVP and its institutes were, and that it is hard to argue a clear one way ideological street existed from scientific journal to party ideology.<sup>182</sup>

Further looking at the list of most productive authors in the KVP journal, one can see there were quite a few articles that did not have an author. Most of these were rather factual descriptions about either Dutch politics or important events abroad, where perhaps the editors or the authors thought adding their name to the piece did not add anything of worth. Not counting [empty] and the Centrum as an author, in total there were 416 different authors that together wrote 1006 articles in the postwar period. Around a third of those, 318, had been written by the 18 productive writers above. Without going into too much detail, all these authors were once part of the editorial staff, (prominent) members of the KVP or otherwise simply catholic. Direct links with ordoliberals have not been found. Only indirect links based on speculation could be provided, such as that Norbert Schmelzer's parents were both German. Schmelzer, a productive author and an important political leader of the KVP in the postwar period, would have been in the position to achieve closer ties with the ordoliberals/CDU, or was more likely to digest (ordoliberal) German literature.<sup>183</sup>

Leaving aside this speculation, instead the contents of the Centrum's reports and the scientific journa are looked at more closely. An interesting development in this respect, is a gradual change from a clear catholic perspective to a christian-democratic perspective. Especially in the first five years, many topics were viewed from a clear catholic perspective, such as the question whether the catholics are politically united, the relation of catholicism and democracy, or simply catholic politics. As a catholic party, that is not so strange of course, especially if one considers that in those beginning years the amount of authors that had a clerical background was quite noticeable.<sup>184</sup> If one compares these years with later years, one can see a clear tendency towards to christian-democratic perspective. Starting in 1954 with a piece by W.J. Schuyt about the goal of christian-democrats in Europe, the christian-democratic perspective become more commonplace, before nearly fully ousting catholic topics in the sixties. Concrete issues that were covered, mostly corresponded with the topical issues of the time, such as the relation of the European part of the Netherlands with its (former) colonies. Quite typical were the rather frequent publications about everything that revolves around family life, and even more so about education. Both, but especially the latter, remained a central topic throughout the whole postwar period.<sup>185</sup>

In all the different articles, no direct reference to ordoliberalism or to one of the ordoliberals had been found. However, that does not mean the contents of articles have nothing in common with ordoliberal ideas. For example, it is interesting to observe that the Maandschrift included about a dozen articles, in which the authors clearly worried about the interests of small farmers, such as Röpke did. Moreover, already in 1947 the journal published articles about restraining the power of capitalism by introducing co-determination, just like Müller-Armack and Rüstow suggested. The sort of reasoning is also similar to Röpke, relying his argument a lot on ethics and old philosophers. Pieces that argued for introducing a market economy cannot be found. In most articles, the market was already considered a given, and the author would just place a sidenote on how to improve the situation. There were definitely pieces that wanted to help the market, for example by increasing the financing options by the state. There were also calls for businesses to let go of private agreements, for only if there would be more competition the prices of goods would drop. In contrast, there were also articles that pointed at some problems with the market. For example, in 1960 the Maandschrift published an article in which it spoke about cartel legislation as blocking useful agreements and inducing excessive competition. That is of course in sharp contrast with ordoliberal theories, and especially with Böhm. All in all, one can say the KVP's view on the market economy was rather ambivalent, but definitely accepted it as a starting point. Compared with ordoliberalism, there were more pieces that wanted interventions or social checks on market forces. As no pieces could be found that wanted to abolish the market economy, but neither any pieces that advocated the introduction of it, it is safe to say the catholics did not consider it an important topic. They focused on the 'social' part of the social market economy, as it were. In this, the positions were often comparable to the ordoliberals, although the former were slightly more concerned with social matters, which was mostly based on ethic and/or religious consideration.

As a last interesting observation, the KVP's publications were rather focused on Germany. Before it has been said that most editions of the scientific journal included a section that described foreign developments. In the earlier years of its publication, the range of foreign nations that were observed was quite limited, with mostly Western nations, Russia and the colonies. This quickly grew, to also encompass everything up to exotic 'nations' such as Mozambique and South-West-Africa. Although pieces on Belgium, France, the UK and also the US were significant, pieces on Germany were by far the greatest. These were not only about political developments such as elections, but also about more in-depth issues, such as the way industrial organisations are organised there. From around 1956 the frequency of articles about Germany increased significantly, with also lots of 'simple' updates about the CDU. In contrast, developments in other nations were barely ever mentioned if they had no obvious inherent news value. It is interesting to note that the extra upped German reporting frequency coincided with the clear rise of articles from a christian-democratic perspective. Lastly, at some point the books that were reviewed in the scientific journal, were more often in German than in Dutch, English and French combined. Although this was not the case throughout the whole postwar period, there was definitely an opportunity for works from ordoliberals to make it into the KVP's journal. Interestingly, none of the ordoliberal champions actually did though. Perhaps this has something to do with the fact that most of their books were published before the postwar period. That they did not make it into the book review section, does not mean ordoliberal books have not been reviewed. The authors of the reviewed books could have been influenced heavily by the ordoliberal champions, for example. Another important reason for the absence of ordoliberal books, is that they mostly covered topics that were closely related to the social market economy, and as discussed above, topics about the market economy itself were rather neglected by the Maandschrift and the Politiek.

V Comparison & Discussion

The detailed descriptions of the five scientific bureaus and their publications allows for many interesting observations and conclusions. The most important conclusion is that the ideas that the German scientific bureaus expressed, were clearly ordoliberal. In addition, in the Netherlands only significant ordoliberal traces have been found at the Teldersstichting.

The Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung was perhaps the easiest scientific bureau for drawing conclusions about the extent of ordoliberalism of their publications, because it so clearly was. Although its publications barely referred to the term 'liberalism', the ordoliberal ideas were minutely reproduced. If all the different scientific institutes are considered, the KAS clearly had the most direct links with the ordoliberals. Under Müller-Armack's leadership the popular economic seminar was created, Böhm was the second most productive author of Die Politische Meinung, and several other ordoliberals wrote in the Meinung as well, including those considered less influential. Thereby the most obvious ordoliberal inputs of the KAS have been established, although some others are discussed below. When one wants to determine the role this specific scientific bureau had in the transposition of ordoliberal ideas to policy, one must not forget that the first predecessor of the KAS only started being used in December 1956. That is more than 8 years after Erhard became the director of the bizonal Economics Administration in early 1948, and 7 after he became Germany's first postwar Minister of Economics in 1949. Therefore, the straightforward conclusion is that the KAS did not have any role whatsoever in the transposition from theory to policy. It is likely that it was Erhard's success that kept a constant stream of ordoliberal policies going. His verbal skills, the organisation behind him and particularly the Wirtschaftswunder caused people to trust these policies. Most important among these people were the CDU politicians, who supported him, despite his ideas being in contrast with much of what the constituent predecessor parties of the CDU advocated. With the closely intertwined relation of the CDU with the KAS, it comes as no surprise that the KAS too stucked to Erhard's ordoliberal policies. Some leaders of the scientific bureau even admitted that Erhard and Adenauer were their idols, and that these two defined what christian democracy is. Perhaps these are exponents of a time when respect for authority was the norm, but either way it is a strong explanation of how ordoliberal ideas made their way into the KAS.

With Erhard providing the CDU and the KAS a constant stream of ordoliberal ideas during his time at the helm of German (economic) politics, one comes to wonder how the ordoliberal ideas reached him. Although it is not clear what or who has been most influential, many factors can be pointed out. His teachers, Wilhelm Riegel and Franz Oppenheimer, must have increased Erhard's enthusiasm for the subsequent plans for the social market economy by Müller-Armack. Müller-Armack on his turn referred to many other ordoliberals. These are important factors of influence on Erhard's ideas before he came into a position of power. During his reign, the ordoliberals were also in a position of power to steer Erhard in the ordoliberal direction. Röpke was one of his personal advisors, and among other ordoliberals, Eucken, Böhm and Müller-Armack were in the academic advisory board of his Ministry.

What about the role of the Friedrich-Naumann-Stiftung then? This scientific bureau had been more progressive than the party with which it was affiliated. The FDP was partly dependent on sponsors from the industry, a problem which the CDU only had during its first few years of existence. This dependence caused some inconsistencies or insecurities when it came to the policy stances of the party. Especially anti-cartel and anti-monopoly measures were troublesome, for the industry did not back these. The FNS did not have these problems, because it was fully independent from the FDP. Therefore, it could express all the ideas that it saw fit to its liberal colour. Perhaps the diverse composition of the organisation of the scientific bureau also played an important role in keeping it on a progressive, non-laissez faire track. Either way, during the first 10, independent years of its existence its ideas were clearly ordoliberal. Even the scientific bureaus itself deemed it so. It repeatedly claimed that the social market economy and the other policies pursued by Erhard, stemmed directly from liberal legacy. If one considers that none of the nearly 140 authors in ORDO contributed to liberal and barely any other personal links with ordoliberals have been found, one is inclined to believe that the FNS embraced ordoliberal ideas because of ideological reasons. With respect to the role of the FNS between ideas and policies, it is unlikely that the ordoliberal ideas of the FNS had much direct influence on the policies of the FDP in the postwar period. Factor that probably played a role are the fact that the CDU claimed Erhard's policies, that the FDP relied on money from the industry, and that the FDP found the FNS too moderate during its independence.

Did all the efforts of both the KAS and the FNS then have no effect on policymaking? On the contrary, they must have. In the researched period, both scientific bureaus were clearly ordoliberal. The greater part of the participants of their activities were students. In addition, the KAS had moulded CDU party members for a long time, an example which the FNS followed in the late sixties. Therefore, it is well plausible that the new generation of leaders had been influenced by the ideas of the scientific bureaus. Moreover, teachers, journalists and other public opinion makers were targeted as well. Furthermore, there is also a good example of a more direct link between ideas and policy. Once the FNS and the FDP sealed their new close relationship, within a year the protracted internal fighting over the cartel legislation was suddenly over. In 1971 the FDP adopted the 'Freiburger Thesen', a political manifesto that closely resembled ordoliberal thought as a whole. The manifesto was written by the Karl-Hermann Flach, one of the most productive authors of the liberal. In this, it is shown that the scientific bureaus had short-term national success in pushing ordoliberal thought. As both scientific bureaus have been in contact with many local politicians as well, it would be interesting for future research to investigate the effects these bureaus have had on local policies.

In the Netherland the term 'ordoliberalism' has not been used. In Germany the expression was not common in the postwar period. In both countries the term 'neoliberalism' appeared occasionally, but definitely quite frequently at both liberal scientific bureaus, the FNS and the Teldersstichting. Both also referred to 'modern liberalism', although this term was more common at the latter. 'Neoliberalism' or 'modern liberalism' was nearly always contrasted with the excesses of the prewar liberalism, and most often the comparison was actually explicitly with the 19th century. At the FNS instead of calling it liberalism, sometimes the derogatory term 'manchesterism' was used as well. At both the fight against collectivism also repeatedly came to the fore. In fact, both the constructions of their arguments and the conclusions that they drew, closely resembled each other. As such, both scientific bureaus belonged to the international neoliberal current, at least until the late sixties. However, some differences have to be noted. Whereas the FNS is clearly ordoliberal, the Teldersstichting sometimes draws some conclusion that deviate from it. The most eye-catching is that the Teldersstichting favoured government interference by means of anti-cyclical policies. This is a showcase of the influence of keynesianism. In contrast, the FNS was strictly opposed to these policies. Perhaps the differences on this crucial point can be explained by the limited links between the Teldersstichting and German scientific bureaus or Germany in general. Indeed, the most productive writer of the Liberaal Reveil in the postwar period did plead for the implementation of the policies furthered by Röpke and Erhard, but he barely referred to it again. Other authors barely even mentioned anything that could be considered as going in this direction. Looking at the literature reviews, the one discussed ordoliberal work can be considered insignificant. In other words, the stream of thoughts from Germany to the Netherlands was very limited in this respect. A language barrier should not have been the cause of it, for why would the Kuyperstichting publish a full-length article in German at the time? Besides, in large parts of the country German was the second language, a fact that was subsequently strengthened by the availability of two German TV channels in addition to the single Dutch one.

Where the cross-border flow of ideas seemed limited by the lack of evidence, the following observations offer circumstantial support for this as well. Namely, at the end of the sixties the Teldersstichting changes its direction somewhat. Indeed, both the FNS and the Teldersstichting changed their rhetorics, but this fits the general trend of deideologification around that time. Big ideas and ideologies were discussed less and less, instead concrete topics took centre stage. However, where the FNS remained clearly ordoliberal, a notable Friedman trend crept in the works of the Teldersstichting. The emphasis in these new pieces was on all the dangers of basically everything the government does, and on the importance of introducing more markets. However, the paleoliberals of Friedman and the likes had not constantly been referred to. Perhaps the relatively short period of only a few years is too short to make any decisive statements on this matter. Therefore it would be an interesting idea for future research to extend the researched period for some more years to see what the influence of the paleoliberals had really been. Moreover, for a scientific bureau that lists Mises, Hayek and Friedman among the most influential liberals but excludes ordoliberals, one would say that at some point the influence of the paleoliberals started to weigh more than the more moderate stream of neoliberals that used to prevail. Furthermore, contemporary VVD politics arguably showcase this shift too, with its constant pleads for more market, austerity and privatisations. Fully at odds with these considerations, are the numerous reference in to the 'sociale markteconomie' in numerous official VVD party documents in the eighties and nineties. Indeed, the corresponding ideas sound very familiar. Then when and how did the ideas of the social market economy make its breakthrough? This research cannot answer that question, but one with an extended timeslot to be studied, may.<sup>186</sup>

Although the postwar economic situations in Germany and Netherlands were very similar, the political situations were not. Due the occupation and some radical changes, the formation of new parties started later than in the Netherlands, with the exception of the continued SPD. The two other main parties, the FDP and the CDU, were a mixed lot that still needed to find their own identity. In the creation of the their scientific bureaus, both parties saw a means of achieving that. The KAS ultimately received widespread support for its foundation from within the different groups of the CDU, whereas the founder of the FNS did not even consult them. Unsurprisingly, the KAS was successful in reaching the CDU members with its message of a common christian-democratic identity, whereas the FNS furthered the sounds of one specific wing of the FDP and had troubles reaching the others. In the Netherlands radical reforms were not deemed necessary, and society fell back on prewar societal institutions. Largely the same political parties dominated the scenes. The KVP was easily the most dominant and had been in government during the whole postwar period. Moreover, the scientific journals and the scientific bureau itself, though they claimed functional independence, fell directly under the KVP. Both could explain the tendency of the Katholiek Staatskundig Maandschrift and the Politiek to be rather pragmatic in their approach. The scientific journals did not question the existence of the market, but also did not explicitly support it. Rather they focused on making it more social. Some of their ideas can be considered similar to ordoliberal ideas, but it is not the result of ordoliberal reasoning or ordoliberal thought. No references to ordoliberals or ordoliberalism have been found. The approach of the Kuyperstichting can be juxtaposed to that of the catholic scientific journals. It was rigid and ideological. No ordoliberal influences in the Kuyperstichting have been found. In the end of the sixties, it gradually lost some of its strict, normative feathers. During this time, some sporadic references to the CDU had been made in the context of forming something similar in the Netherlands. Its catholic counterpart can even be considered a little obsessed with this issue. The CDU acquired a special place in its reporting, and the German party was always viewed favourably. It would be interesting to see whether the ultimate fusion into the Dutch CDA was driven by changing ideas in the scientific journals. It would be even more interesting to see how the economic policies were shaped. It is known that the scientific bureaus of the KVP, ARP and CHU started to meet regularly from 1971 onwards, but were their roles precisely? Did they look at their big ordoliberal sister, the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung? Did they try to create a confession transcending sound by looking at christian values, and if so, did they too result in ordoliberal ideas? Or is it also tricky to find links with ordoliberalism in the seventies? If so, did Friedman's economic theories find their way to the christian democrats, but were these theories weakened by christian morals? If future research could find answers to these questions, that would also help.<sup>187</sup>

Other than the named reasons for extending the timeslot in future research, it would be interesting to find out the role of scientific bureaus in the gradual change towards a society with more anglosaxon economic influences. Especially the steps away from the social market economy in Germany would be interesting in this respect. Extending the research to also cover non-scientific party journals could also prove to be interesting. This way the knowledge about the influence of the ordoliberals, before the scientific bureaus were founded, can be deepened. For example, it is known that directly after the war, the FDP republished several articles of Röpke in its 'Informationsdienst' that were originally published in the Neue Zürcher Zeitung. What was the role of these non-scientific party journals and to what extent were its messages ordoliberal? Another interesting research would fit in the tradition to link religion to economics. It was interesting to see that practically all members of the Teldersstichting came from the Western parts of the Netherlands, and that the VVD could only get a real foothold in the catholic south during the sixties. For a long time, the party was also dominated by (moderate) protestants. That is very interesting, because the ordoliberal heavyweights were (moderate) protestants too. Does ordoliberalism stem from (moderate) protestantism? If so, that would have important implications for the differences of economic thought in Germany and the Netherlands, compared with countries that are dominated by catholicism. Researching the influence of ordoliberalism in the mostly catholic Austria, could be a good approach for this. The last suggested possibility for future research would be to include the scientific bureaus fo the SPD and the PvdA in the analysis. Of the three major currents, this one probably made the most radical shift. Nowadays it is hard to spot a social-democrat that talks about socialisation and centrally planned economies. However, noone is surprised to hear that social-democrat Jeroen Dijsselbloem wants to be assured that investments of the EIB do not crowd out parties from the private market. Where did the ideological shift occur? What was the role of the social-democratic scientific bureaus? To which extent did ordoliberalism find its way there?

An observation that has not been discussed is the role of money in the scientific bureaus. As one may suspect, it does matter. First, it is interesting to see that the scientific bureaus that are economically dependent on their affiliated party, stick closer to the party line. The KAS used to be fully dependent on the CDU, although subsequently this greatly declined; the Centrum voor Staatkundige Vorming and the catholic scientific journals were fully dependant on the KVP; even the Kuyperstichting had always had to rely on extra funding by the ARP, despite the former's income from investments. These three scientific bureaus sticked relatively close to the party line. In contrast, the two liberal parties did so much less. The Teldersstichting did not receive funding from the VVD, and neither did the FNS. The policy approaches of these two scientific bureaus can be considered more idealistic. Once the FNS got in real money trouble, the FDP stepped in with financial help in exchange for increased party links. Subsequently, the FNS published more FDP-related material. The second observation is more obvious, but not any less important. Of the researched five scientific bureaus, the KAS was by far the largest. The FNS is significantly smaller, but still a giant when compared to the Dutch scientific bureaus. This is not the result of the popularity of the respective institutes, but simply due to resources. From the moment the German government started funding scientific bureaus of political parties, they started growing rapidly both in scale and scope. It is not too daring to state that all the extra seminars, scholarships, publications and expansions abroad, caused the German bureaus to be more influential than their Dutch counterparts.

No research is without its shortcomings, and this is not an exception. One shortcoming is that not all available material could have been studied, because the quantity is just so large. Another shortcoming is that most information was new for the author, the first time he studied the material. As a result of both shortcomings, some relevant facts could have been missed. However, due to the method of research, it is likely that the potential misses are limited to interesting interlinkages among the several institutes. It is unlikely that the core of the research, the extent of ordoliberal thought, can be stained. By first sharpening what ordoliberalism is and researching the people who were involved with that ideology, plus embedding this narrative in international developments, this coherent information could be used as a framework to look at the scientific bureaus individually. If time would permit going over all the material once more, the conclusion about the extent of ordoliberalism would remain exactly the same. Only some interesting interlinkages could be missed, for example if a footnote in material of the scientific bureau that was studied first, contains information about an important person of the fifth studied bureau. However, by making selections of the most relevant material to study, before actually doing so, the extent of ordoliberalism in the five scientific bureaus has been determined with great care.
